At It Again

"We ought," says the Hon. Theodore Bell—vehement friend of the people and self-sacrificing devotee of public office—"to close the great chasm between the Democratic and Republican parties, and sit down and reach an agreement that every man placed in public office should be clean." A noble, edifying sentiment and one in which all true patriots will concur. And it is a sentiment characteristic of that distinguished favorite son of Napa who but recently lent the dignity and light of his presence to the national convention of the Bryanized Democracy, presiding over that illustrious body with exceeding grace, and ravishing it with his highfalutin parts of speech. Mr. Bell is a fine sample of the class of statesmen by which the Democracy is now dominated. In the light of his utterances it is easy to take the measure of the man, and the foregoing excerpt from one of his speeches is of average luminosity. Lighting us along the devious way of his mental operations, it enables us to peer into the depths of his profoundest philosophy and observe the mainspring of his formulas for freedom and for redeeming the people from thralldom and misery. What an imposing idea is that of the closing of the partisan chasm while all good men and true sit down and reach the beneficent agreement that none but the clean shall be elected to public office! How fascinating the picture! How alluring the project and how feasible! How refreshing to contemplate the glad prospect of solving the problem that embraces all our political woes! Assuredly the thought that blossomed in this practical suggestion, thus thrown into the world from the upper air, far removed from the commonplaces of existence, bespeaks rare lucidity of mind and a firm grasp on the principles of government and of human happiness. There may be those amongst us who will sneer at the gallant son of Napa and deride him for what they may conceive to be transparent cant, but, indifferent to the jibes of the cynical, encased in the armor of his own sincerity, the young sage of the Democracy will pursue the even tenor of his way, firm and fearless in his determination to keep the unclean out of office, and to see that the administration of government shall be in the hands of the sterilized and pure. And, needless to say, Mr. Bell is himself of the pure,—nay of the simon pure—though he embodies a flat contradiction of an old proverb, for to him most things are absolutely impure, not to say tainted and putrescent. If they were otherwise Mr. Bell would be a missionless young patriot. Were all things pure this sincere and righteous young man would in all probability wear out his hindparts baying the moon.

Some Symptoms of Degeneracy

The Prohibition platform calls for "a suffrage based on literacy." The Prohibitionists believe no doubt that literacy implies intelligence, common sense and the power of discriminating wisely in matters political. Yet the Prohibitionists themselves afford exemplification of the futility of literacy for certain purposes. The ability to read and write has not saved them from fanaticism. Through the ability to read and write they have acquired a superficial knowledge of the science of government and of sociology, and upon the strength of their little learning they are wasting their energies trying to convert their intellectual superiors to a system of living which, because it is suitable to their temperament, seems to them fit and proper for all other temperaments. It would probably pain the Prohibitionists very much to be told that in their case literacy has brought on degeneracy, but such is the case if we may rely on the authority of Max Nordau. According to that scientific gentleman one of the strongest symptoms of degeneracy is discontent with the social order. The degenerate is to be distinguished from the enlightened reformer, Nordau tells us, by his ridiculous aims and his tendency to beat the air. He hatches astoundingly mad projects for improving the world. He selects among the arrangements of civilization such as are either immaterial or distinctly suitable in order to rebel against them. From the Prohibition platform we learn that the Prohibitionists propose the "suppression of the social evil." Now surely this is a mad project. And surely the social evil is one of the arrangements which should be regarded as suitable to the present state of civilization. It is not an ideal arrangement, but civilization must make great progress before it can realize its ideals. Indeed so far is it from the realization of its ideals that while it hypocritically turns its back on the one social evil which it might regulate to some advantage, it encourages many social evils infinitely more mischievous than the particular object of Prohibition hostility. We hope that Max Nordau is in error in his treatise on the obsessions that denote degeneracy, for we should rather attribute the mad projects of the Prohibitionists to religious zeal than to mental obliquity.

An Ideal Reformer

The probability is that New York's great reformer, Governor Hughes, will be renominated. Such is the opinion of shrewd observers of the political situation. And yet the attitude of all the leading Republican politicians of New York toward Governor Hughes is that of bitter hostility. But as this is the year of a national campaign the Republican politicians of New York are concerned with something more than the personality of the State executive. They realize that the National ticket upon which depends the security of the Federal machine is none too strong in New York, and they are sensible of the tremendous popularity of Governor Hughes. They need Governor Hughes more than he needs them; for that gentleman, with his honors thick upon him, would be well satisfied to retire to private life. "He will no more lift his finger for the office," says the New York Post, "than he would for the Presidency." But the office, in this instance, seeks the man, and thus is exemplified the wisdom of a policy which is rarely the principle of conduct in public office. The essence of this policy is conscientious devotion to duty combined with absolute indifference to political expediency. This is a policy that calls for firmness and courage, and that is not easily adhered to by the public servant with one eye on a second term. When a man enters upon a public career with a second term in view, however exalted his ideals, he is very apt to yield to the persuasive voice of political advantage, which is usually a siren voice that lures to compromises with conscience and eventually to destruction. Statesmen with excellent intentions have found it easy to reconcile the performances of the politican with the professions of the idealist. They argue that as the prolongation of their services is to the advantage of the people, and as the people might be deprived of those services were the political bosses to be treated cavalierly, it follows that capitulation to the bosses is in the interest of all concerned. This is the species of sophistry by which the Pardees of the country have been converted into obvious charlatans. Now it may be accepted as an axiom of political science that no man can be true to the people who is not true to himself. And while it often happens that the people, seduced by catchwords, embrace the demagogue and repudiate the man who is true to himself, it does not follow that deception is essential to the winning of their confidence. This was exemplified in the career of Grover Cleveland and it is now exemplified in the career of Mr. Hughes who, as the Post tells us, "has compromised with not a single politician," and "who has been the Governor of all the people of the State doing precisely what he considered to be the right without the slightest regard for consequences." And his straightforward devotion has been recognized and appreciated the country over. He is a reformer who has reformed things without vituperating his opponents, without employing scurrility and without demanding that anybody be driven out of his party. How different the aspect which he presents from that of our local reformers!

The President and The Prisoner

The Baltimore Sun asks: "Does President Roosevelt feel at all easy in his mind when he thinks of the wretched conditions under which Colonel Stewart is living with the approval of the commander-in-chief, because of this unfortunate officer's temperamental infirmities?" Assuredly President Roosevelt does feel easy in his mind. If he did not feel easy in his mind he would not keep Colonel Stewart in the wretched conditions that are now the lot of that unfortunate officer. It must be assumed that he is well informed as to the nature of those conditions, for they have been described in all the newspapers of the land, and President Roosevelt is one of the subscribers of a clipping bureau. But President Roosevelt's sensibilities are not easily wrought upon by pictures of physical suffering. He is a strong man with perfect control of his emotions. There is nothing suggestive of effeminate tenderness in his make-up. A daring rough rider, a mighty hunter, a muscular athlete who loves the strenuous life, he exults in examples of great human endurance, and scenes of slaughter are to him a source of ecstasy. Why should this hero of the cattle range and the forest, this doer of doughty deeds, be expected to suffer mental discomposure from thoughts of the situation of the prisoner of our Devil's Island. If Colonel Stewart has no relish for life at Fort Grant he can resign. The alternative is not quite so severe as that which a Roman conqueror gave to his captive king who begged to be excused from playing the leading role in a great pageant. He was told that he might avoid the humiliation by killing himself. Colonel Stewart does not have to stay at Fort Grant. But while there he must suffer, for his only companions are a negro, a sick white man, venomous spiders and rattlesnakes. The latest news from Fort Grant is that an empty coffin was received there the other day, but it is absurd to suppose that it was intended as a piece of gruesome symbolism. In all probability it was intended for the sick man, whose case is perhaps hopeless anyway.

The Proposed Spy System

Whether the people of this city have been surfeited with intrigues conducted ostensibly in the interest of public morals is a question it might be well to have answered before too much money is spent on the luxury of a spy system independent of the police department. Aside from the fact that the city is in debt to its school teachers and cannot afford luxuries, there are many objections that might be urged against importing into this country a system which has been responsible in Europe for abhorrent practices and enormous crimes. One of the chief objections to the local project is that the spies are to be under the direction of a private detective, who is to become a government detective only in the sense that he is to cease drawing pay from an ambitious millionaire to whom he owes allegiance. And even though this detective were inaccessible to private influence we should still be justified in questioning his fitness for the office inasmuch as at present the repairing of a tattered professional reputation is to him a matter of paramount importance. Were this detective a man of the highest probity, still we should feel that it would be a great outrage to put in his hands the power contemplated. It is not unreasonable to suppose that this detective, whose instincts are those of the man hunter, may be animated principally by the desire to revenge himself on everybody who has aided in his circumvention. For two years he has been engaged in an extraordinary contest, instinct with the elementary passions and pregnant with ruin for many of the participants. This contest has developed into a feud, as bitter in its animosities as that which raged between the Houses of York and Lancaster. In the course of its development we have seen officers of the law and officers of the court and the court itself resorting to the most discreditable practices in furtherance presumably of a beneficent end. Finally a situation has been reached in which the agents of justice, as a result of their zeal and of the expedients adopted to avert humiliation and defeat, are in a plight much worse than that of the men they have been pursuing. And now though these agents of justice are in control of the police power of the city; though they represent in fact all that there is to our system for discovering, prosecuting and punishing crime, yet it is proposed to equip them with a secret power to be exercised in co-operation with all their other powers. Now manifestly the potentiality for mischief in all this is tremendous. For manifestly these men whose worst passions have been aroused in the course of the protracted struggle which they have had, and who are now, from the highest to the lowest, prompted by self-interest to acquiesce in whatever is done are not to relied upon to scorn the expedients of criminal cunning. They are not a holy order set apart and endowed with peculiar sanctity, representing God and administering his gifts. Most of them as we have seen are common clay, accessible to the emotions of the humblest citizens. From what we know of them we feel they should not be put in the way of temptation; not that we are at all solicitous for their spiritual welfare, but that we do not relish the prospect of being plunged into the Florentine atmosphere of the days of the Medici. At the same time, being a taxpayer, we do not like to see the money wasted. That it will not serve to vindicate justice we are convinced. Nay we are of the opinion that it will induce the adoption of methods by which justice will be frustrated. That the men who are to consume the appropriation are prone to such methods we all know. Indeed it seems impossible for them to forego such methods, as witness, for example, the curious process by which they hope to fix the guilt of the men accused of the dynamiting outrage. It is possible that those men are guilty, but it is highly improbable that after Detective Burns gets all that curious evidence together which he has been gathering with melodramatic touches and with absolute and sublime confidence in himself he will be able to persuade twelve men that it should be acceptable as proof of guilt. However, we must admit that a great deal depends on the way the twelve men are got into the box.

Women in Politics

Mrs. Humphrey Ward in a letter to The Times of London takes it for granted that the suffrage movement in this country has come to an end, and holds that the seemingly inevitable success of the movement in England is delusive. Incidentally she asserts that the activity of the suffragists in this country has hindered the natural progress of women in school suffrage and barred them from service on school boards where they can do good and needed work. This is a rather curious view of the matter. Whatever progress women have made toward having their services accepted on school boards has been due entirely to their political activity. It was not until they became clamorous for the privilege of voting that anybody took their claims with sufficient seriousness to suggest the advisability of permitting them to participate in the management of a school department. Their influence in educational work is no longer confined to classroom drudgery, and the suffragists may justly point with pride to this fact as one of the triumphs of their propaganda. As to Mrs. Ward's pessimistic view of the suffragist movement in England, that, too, may be challenged. Certain Liberal papers and several distinguished British statesmen are doubtful of the possibility of ignoring the movement or sneering it away. Even the dignified and dogmatic Saturday Review which reflects the cultured sentiment of England, now admits that there is a great deal to be said in favor of giving women the same suffrage as men and that many, if not most, of the stock objections to women having votes will not hold water. In England there are many writers and statesmen who do not share in the alarm of the good people who see the end of all things in a woman getting the power to vote. Nor do they fear that the enfranchisement of women will unsex fair voters, or result in the subjugation of men, the ruin of the home and the effacement of all the graces of life. They are as stolidly indifferent in this matter as Calvin was when John Knox, having been banished from England by Mary Tudor and proscribed in Scotland by the Regent Mary of Guise, went about preaching that for a woman to rule over any realm was repugnant to nature, contumely to God and a subversion of good order. While Calvin was not in favor of the government of women, he could not be induced to join in Knox's agitation because he could not find encouragement in the Scripture; neither in the cases of Deborah and Huldah, nor in the prophecy of Isaiah that queens should be the nursing mother of the church. Now in England where the people have had some experience with queens, and where feminine influence is openly invoked in electioneering campaigns, there are many intelligent men who say, "What is the use of saying women should not mix themselves up in the demoralizing game of politics when we, both sides alike, use them as much as we possibly can to make men vote our own way?"

Educational Reform

General Andrew S. Draper, Commissioner of Education in New York, has roused the ire of the educational faddist by advocating the adaption of the school curriculum to industrial ends. General Draper has discovered what others have persistently closed their eyes to—that the faults of the present system are not confined to secondary schools and colleges but are inherent in the primary and grammar school courses. He says the schools should send the pupils forth, at whatever age they leave, fitted to take hold of the practical concerns of life. The Independent takes issue with him, assuming that he believes children in school should be made ready to step into the factory with an acquired knowledge of the work therein, into the mercantile house learned in elements of trade, and into the rural districts with practical knowledge of farming and milking. As a matter of fact the schools are making an attempt to teach a little of everything. What General Draper aims at is a return to the conditions of thirty years or so ago, when boys and girls came out of grammar school well grounded in the elementary branches. Boys used to step out of the upper grammar grades straight into business colleges, and after a brief commercial course which was but a continuation of the work they had been engaged upon, they found occupation in stores and offices. Others would apprentice themselves to tool-trades and climb to the top in their chosen craft. Only those who expected to devote themselves to a profession entered the secondary schools or colleges, and instead of the present system of an artificially prolonged period of irresponsibility during which play is the major consideration, every pupil with ambition enough to learn more than was forced from him was eager to make as rapid progress as possible and be out in the world for himself.

Perspective Impressions

It is now said that President Castro is a dangerous lunatic. In the circumstances the people of Venezuela ought to know that the people of this country apprehend their emotions.

Mayor Taylor has discovered that the City Hall dome is still in a condition to serve as a memento of the earthquake and fire. And he blames it on the architects. Nothing like having a scapegoat when you're in public office.

If you like the kind of government you are getting under the Spreckels' dispensation, and think it better that all the beautiful whims and edifying caprices of the Spreckels family should be gratified than that factional strife should cease, vote the Lincoln-Roosevelt ticket.

Mr. Bryan threatens to "expose" Mr. Hearst. Go it Bill! Pile up the scurrility and personal abuse, and thus prove your fitness for the job. Besides we dearly love to see men exposed, for it helps us to realize that we do not monopolize all the vices.

HE SAYS HE CAN HITCH IT. CAN HE?

—Gillam in the New York Globe.

If you believe that the Hon. Rudolph Spreckels is deserving of encouragement go to the polls and vote the Lincoln-Roosevelt League ticket.

It is easy to offer a plausible solution of the mystery of the shot heard and the blood found near the Hon. Francis J. Heney's home the other night. Very often the effect on Mr. Heney of shooting off his mouth is a "nose-bleed."

A platitudinous parasite is the latest appellation for the Democratic Presidential nominee. As it is believed of Mr. Taft that he is safe and sane and at the same time a faithful disciple of Roosevelt, it might be well to call him a ponderous paradox. And while in the alliterative mood why not call Hearst's candidate a preposterous plutophobist.

Both wings of the Democracy, we are told, are in favor of renominating Judge Dunne. And judging from the length of time it takes the Supreme Court to consider whether certain language used by him ought to be construed as prejudicial to the interests of our judicial system we are beginning to think that perhaps he is entitled to a certificate of character from the learned justices.

The Gallery of Recollections

By Hans Muller

After he had achieved fame and success in Paris, Braganza returned to Vienna. The painter had always found it difficult to make friends, and during his absence the few that he had already acquired in Vienna had grown away from him. His fame served to attract artists and art lovers; but after a while they realized that this raw-boned, shabbily dressed painter had few social charms. So of all the doors that had at first been thrown open to him there remained but one to which he returned often. At the latchstring of this one he frequently tugged. It belonged to a strange man, much older than himself, the famous surgeon Burgermeister, who had been introduced to Braganza as a noble lover of art; and after a few meetings he frequently accepted the hospitality of the professor, and in a comparatively short time a warm friendship arose between the two men.

One evening after an ample dinner the two men sat together, sipping a delicious wine and arguing the idle question which of the arts takes precedence over its sisters. Braganza grew animated in defense of painting, while the professor contended that if the question were considered seriously, music must be given the preference. "Music," he continued, "is not an imitative art. It does not arise out of observation, but on the contrary, stimulates perception and is the purest expression of an artistic temperament. A picture is merely a reproduction of nature, while melody leads us directly to nature or lifts us to a sphere of higher naturalness. In fact, there is nothing for which it cannot prepare us. In comparison with this power, how weak is the art that you defend! What picture, even by the most famous master, begins to approach our own recollection of things seen? Is not each one of us the greatest painter for himself when he closes his eyes and allows recollections to limn the picture?" Then approaching the painter with his customary mincing steps he asked: "Shall I show you my gallery of recollections?" And without more ado he led the painter from the room.

"I really do not know what prompted me to lead you into this chamber—a place that heretofore no one but myself has ever entered. But now I have brought you here, all that the room contains shall be revealed to you."

He lit two broadly shaded lamps and invited the painter to step to the middle of the room. The light revealed a square chamber, the floor of which was covered with a heavy red rug. With the exception of two chairs, there was no furniture. The walls were of a grayish tint and were dotted with a goodly number of picture frames of all kinds: polished ebony set off by colored plush edges; dainty frames, scarcely bigger than a hand's span, hung next to pieces of deep and elaborate carving. And every frame was empty. As the painter's glance swept the room it seemed to him like an exhibition of a maker of frames.

The professor allowed the painter to continue his observation until the latter turned to his host with a questioning look.

"Now that I have shown you this toy, you wish to know its use, do you not?" Burgermeister said. "My long life has been crowded with moments that sprang from tremendous impulses, emotions that are unquenchable and glimpses of unmarred beauty. Now I have grown old and am a lonely man. Here, then, are the recollections of my whole life; minutes, as well as years, of my past; the happiest laugh and the saddest tear I have known. Nature has not given me a hand with the cunning necessary to wield a brush, but I believe that I have the eye of an artist—I have a fancy that composes great symphonies of color. My memories are paintings, my tears statues. Come, let me lead you through my gallery!"

He lifted one of the lamps and placed it before a big gold frame under which appeared the title: "Bay of Naples."

"This is the way I always see that wonderful scene," said the professor, gazing in rapture at the empty wall space. "It is always thus set in gold. Here is the wonderful, dreamy blue sea, bathed in sunlight, and over there is Capri—all just as I saw it the first time I was there. There in the sun's rays and the ripples of the water are mirrored all the hopes of a silly youth."

In a mood half of merriment and half of depression, Braganza followed the professor about the room as he went from one frame to another, lost in deep thought and occasionally venturing some half-explanation that left a great deal to be imagined. "Halstadter Sea" was the title of one, "Marghereta Schick's Death" was another, while a plain black wood frame bore the title "Marie" and a small funeral wreath. When they had come to the third wall the light of the lamp fell on a large frame adorned with plush that bore the word "Confession." Here the professor paused.

"This memory is connected with my life only by professional ties," he explained; "but there is a glorious loveliness about that woman as I see her before me, lying on her white pillow, her fine features sharpened by suffering. So vivid and moving is the picture in my memory that I have stood numberless times before this frame, scarcely able to control the emotion that threatened to overpower me." Then after a long pause, he added: "Yes, I'll let you see this leaf from the diary of a physician! Many years ago," he began, "I was called to a woman whose life, I saw almost at a glance, could be saved only by recourse to an operation. When I first approached her I was so struck by her remarkably delicate beauty that for the first time in my life I feared my hand might tremble while wielding the knife. But the inflammation rapidly grew more violent, and on the following day I performed the operation. It was successful and promised to restore the frail creature to life; but the improvement was followed by a strange sinking spell. It seemed to me that a deeply suffering soul must have devastated the physical powers of the invalid. I visited her daily, not in any hope of changing death into life, but because—though never a complaint passed her lips—I believed that my presence brought to her a certain peace and relief.

"I remember as though it happened only yesterady how one morning, as I was alone with her, she begged me to listen to her story. She had no weak desire for death, but I had aroused in her a certain confidence which prompted her to want to tell me of her life. Distinctly I see every detail before me: The square sick-room draped in red silk; the winter sun shining through the high panes, and this lovely face, dignified by pain and already blanched by the shadows of death, and it is as though I were hearing today that gently modulated voice.

" 'The name that I now bear,' she began, "is my maiden name, and not that of my husband. They may have told you that my husband is dead. That is not true, for he is alive, but we live apart. The estrangement is my own fault—and yet again it is not. When I first knew the man I married he was a young, talented artist, who had already achieved some success. He was naturally full of life and energy. My father opposed the match obstinately, but finally he was won over by the prospect of the artist's success. How can I describe to you the days that followed, in which the deepest wish of our soul was gratified! Months passed in which we heard only the call of love; and in the enchantment of this love I would have lost myself for all time, had not my father roused me to the responsibility of my new position.

Forty-five Minutes from Market Street

By Lester Payne

Forty-five minutes from Market street,—and you are in the midst of a virgin forest where the smell of warmth and growth gladdens the senses, and where you may enter into full communion with the beasts and the flowers of the field. Tell that to the man from Broadway or the man from Los Angeles and you will be advised to tell it to the marines. Yet it is absolutely true. But the man in Market street isn't saying anything about it. He plods along in the dust, dodging automobiles, enthusing perhaps over the mammoth structures going up along his route, but never giving a thought to the fact that over the bay in Marin County there is a beautiful National park where almost throughout the year Pan and the nymphs, the hamadryads and the rest of the humane and Pagan gods might come forth like butterflies after their hibernation of centuries.

FALLEN MONARCH. MUIR WOODS, MT. TAMALPAIS

The man in Market street is a stolid, prosaic individual who doesn't go into raptures over anything. He is provincial in many things—nay, even parochial—but the provincialism that retains the enthusiasms of youth and prompts the villager to "point with pride" to the new department store and the other grand attractions of his town, is not peculiar to the San Franciscan. Local pride he has aplenty, but at singing praises of the features of the metropolis he isn't worth a cent.

One of the chief reasons why San Francisco is a delightful place to do business in is that Marin County is within a short distance thereof. For Marin County has more charms than any other county in California. And one of its most attractive features is the new national park, a deep canyon, one of the grooves in the flank of Tamalpais. This park is now known as Muir Woods having been so named by William Kent who presented it to the government a few months ago. Formerly it was known as Redwood Canyon and for years it has been the favorite resort of nature lovers, but perhaps there are fewer than a thousand residents of this city who have ever availed themselves of its delights.

Mr. Kent made his gift under the act for the preservation of American antiquities of 1906. He made the transfer just in time to prevent a water company from getting possession of part of the beautiful forest tract for reservoir purposes; so it is now under control of the Department of the Interior. Muir Woods is part of what was once a great tract of the Sempervirens or California redwood that covered the slopes of the big guardian mountain by the Golden Gate and veils all the canyons as far away as the picturesque Napa Valley.

In Muir Woods are to be found all the beauties that lie hidden in the shadows of a redwood forest. Within the small compass of 295 acres comprising the tract there are fern brakes deep enough to screen a man up to his shoulders. A brawling trout stream meanders the length of the canyon, now shimmering in the sunlight, now flowing lazily beneath a canopy formed by the interwoven branches of giant redwoods. Along the entire length of the canyon there is nothing but the heavy greenery of redwood, bay and manzanita shrub. The spaces between the tree trunks are choked with wildwood and the heavy drooping fronds of the giant native brake. Nowhere save where the road winds through the park have the axe or the grubbing hoe wrought a change in nature's handiwork.

Here a man with nothing on his mind and a good digestion would soon learn to sleep for twenty-four hours out of twenty-four. Here one may sit with Isaac Walton "under a willow tree by the water side," inhaling the sweetness of a scene unsurpassed, or after the manner of the mad, bad Persian poet achieve the limit of sublunary bliss with a jug of wine and an inspiring companion. For here the air whispers romance in your ears. And such an air! so tonic, so vivifying that even wasted energies are renewed by the intoxicating breath that blows down from the flowered mountain sides.

One can get within striking distance of Muir Woods on a spur track recently built by the Mill Valley and Mount Tamalpais Scenic Railroad Company. This track is half way up the mountain. It takes the passenger over the shoulder of the ridge and down close to the park. Here one finds himself high up over the ocean and shut out from all signs of human existence. And this point you can reach in forty-five minutes from the foot of Market street. Is there another spot so delightful on the earth to be reached in so short a time after leaving the madding crowd of a great commercial center? I for one know of none. Nor do I know of a trip anywhere more interesting than the ride up Mount Tamalpais over the crookedest railroad in the world—a road that climbs to the very top of the mountain by a series of twists and loops, and that affords a panoramic view of the bay, the ocean and a landscape of innumerable ravishing scenes. Almost every tourist that comes to San Francisco takes this trip, but the man in Market street—well sometimes he prefers Market street. Nevertheless all honor to William Kent who gave to San Francisco for all time this glorious playground! A noble gift and a fine tribute to John Muir.

Marin Beautiful

By Thomas J. Lennon

(Judge of the Superior Court of Marin County)

"Town Talk" requests a talk from me on the beauties of Marin County. This request is significant and consoling solely because it indicates that Marin County has at last been discovered. "Town Talk" is to be congratulated for being the first metropolitan newspaper to wake up and give notice of the fact that Marin County with its wealth of natural beauty stands as the homeseekers' paradise, without a rival in the great State of California.

I cannot, and a trained discriptive writer could not, in the time and space allotted do justice to the natural beauties and attractions of all of Marin County. It is all so beautiful, so charming, and so compact that it must be seen and treated in its entirety before it can be fully appreciated. In its entirety it may be justly styled a compendium of nature's poetry. With her climate, genial as a mother's smile, her azure sky, her lofty mountain, her majestic forests, her ever varying scenery combining at once all the elements of the rare, the novel, the picturesque, the sublime and the beautiful, she invites and yet defies the poet's pen and the painter's pencil.

To appreciate her beauties one must roam from valley to valley, penetrate her secluded nooks and dells, ascend her mountain peaks, and there revel in the things of eternal beauty which Mother Nature presents for the pleasure and edification of her children.

As seen from the steamer's deck Sausalito, the threshold of Marin, is indeed fair to look upon. From each of the several natural terraces upon which the town is built is to be had an enchanting view which grows wider, grander and more inspiring as one ascends until, when the summit is reached, there is nothing left to be desired in the magnificant combination of scenes which greet the eye on every hand. All around are superb views of hill and dale, islands and bay, mountains and valleys, cities and towns in bewildering profusion. As you walk through shaded groves, by purling brooks, and flower decked lawns you pause and cease to wonder that the cliff-dweller of Sausalito regards his as the one choice spot on earth.

All the wild magnificence of forest scenery is to be found in the secluded and deep tangled depths of the Muir Woods. In this lofty primeval forest huge redwoods of a thousand years form with their clustering and intertwining boughs high arches and lofty galleries strangely like the daring structures of human art, but only grander, more life-like and more spacious as if raised for a great temple of nature. In the presence of these stupendous monuments of nature the eloquent witnesses of her greatness, the mind is expanded and elevated; every low and groveling thought vanishes and we find ourselves reveling in visions of the infinite and the eternal.

In the valley of the mill, which nestles at the foot of Old Tamaplais, nature reaches her climax of beauty and sublimity, every aspect of which is full of poetry;

> "Her air is living with its spirit
> Her rivulets dance to the music of its melody
> And sparkle in its brightness."

Marin County has no more picturesque locality than this same valley of the mill. To the old residents the beauties of this charming place have long been known, but only in the last few years have its advantages and attractions been made known to the people at large. As I knew it some fifteen or twenty years ago it was a stock ranch with not a score of inhabitants. Today it is a city of beautiful homes with a population of four thousand, and growing so fast that the sunrise of each day discloses the roof of a new dwelling.

Kate Field says: "What Tamalpais is to the hills of Marin County San Rafael is to its valleys—as pretty a nook as nature ever cudgeled out of her prolific brain. Surrounded on three sides by hills, Tamalpais towering in the southwest and San Francisco Bay glittering in the east, with Monte del Diablo as its majestic background, San Rafael blinks and purrs in the sunshine a picture of beautiful content."

San Rafael, with a population of seven thousand, is the county seat of Marin and enjoys the distinction of possessing the most even, temperate climate in the State of California. The best roads and streets that money can buy are maintained throughout the city. The Hotel Rafael with its handsome grounds, the beautiful Dominican College, the rose-covered cottages in every part of the city, the magnificant churches, schools and public buildings, the excellent and frequent transportation facilities, the purest of mountain water and a perfect city government, are just a few of the things that tend to make San Rafael a superb, popular and prosperous city.

A. SWITZ'S RESIDENCE, MILL VALLEY

Many years ago, before the days of the railroad, Marin County, on account of the salubrity of its climate, was chosen by the Mission Fathers as the place to establish a sanitarium for their own recuperation and the health of their Indian charges. To this day, the reputation of the county for healthfulness remains unchanged, and for that reason its valleys and hillsides are being rapidly filled with beautiful homes. Travelers who are familiar with the world at large pronounce this county the Switzerland of America. We have not the towering ranges of the Sierras nor the snowy crests of the Alps, but our mountains are lofty enough to impress one with their grandeur and their densely wooded sides and towering summits overlooking, as they do, green valleys and sparkling water courses present views most charming to the eye and make a permanent residence here most desirable.

The Spectator

Reno as a Mecca for Divorce

The Sothern divorce case recently filed in Reno has served to bring Nevada into the limelight as being the easiest state in the union in which to get a divorce. Since the suit was filed investigation discloses the fact that Reno is the mecca of dissatisfied couples and that its lawyers are doing a very thriving business in this line because, as one of them confided to an impatient client, "Nevada beats South Dakota to a standstill in this game. You can get a divorce here while you're waiting for the next train out of town." This remark is a bit of exaggeration but discloses the situation. The easy freedom of the divorce laws there is illustrated practically in the Sothern case. Neither Mr. or Mrs. Sothern is a resident of that state. Mrs. Sothern, the plaintiff, has never been in the state, except to go straight through it on an express train. Her divorce papers were made out in New York and mailed to a Reno firm of attorneys who are putting the complaint through the lively grinding divorce mill. They alone know what the complaint is, for it is sealed, and under Nevada laws the case can be managed so that the public may never know any of the details except the judgment. This point was covered adroitly when Mr. Sothern obligingly appeared and accepted personal service. So convenient an interpretation has been put upon the law that Mrs. Sothern herself may get the divorce without appearing on the scene. Till this loop hole was discovered by the astute attorneys in the case lawyers generally considered that a six months' residence was necessary. Mrs. Corey, wife of the millionaire steel magnate, served that probation at the time she set him free to marry Mabel Gilman, the actress. This recent very broad rendering of the law is likely to shove Sioux Falls into the background and make Reno the dumping ground of the nation's "easy divorce" hunters.

"Quiet" Divorce Cases Uncovered

Among the score or more of "quiet" suits that have been uncovered in Reno since the Sothern suit attracted attention to the thriving divorce colony is the Morton case. The fair plaintiff heard that Nevada was an easy place to get a divorce and came on from New York to procure one. Her husband is living in England and has never visited the United States, at least so it is claimed. The plaintiff has not lived six months in the state and yet her case is on the court docket. The chances are that the conservative element in Nevada will endeavor to stop all this notoriety at the next meeting of the legislature. Sioux Falls, South Dakota, has awakened to the evil effects of easy divorce laws and will make a strenuous effort this winter to elevate the bars. Financially the divorce business has been a windfall for the little town as the divorce colony averages about five hundred a year and most of them are good spenders from the big eastern cities. The money annually left behind by the colonists is figured at a half a million dollars at least, and it is scattered everywhere, from the hotels to the bootblacks. The lawyers of course get the first whack at the loot. The main streets are lined with their names but competition is now very keen among the smaller fry. The big lawers have connection with law firms in the East; the latter drum up the business and send on the client with the proper credentials. Under this system advertisements "guaranteeing easy and quick divorces" are published freely in the eastern metropolitan papers and business is hunted as actively as in any commercial pursuit.

Nearly Ruined the Business

The notorious Sioux Falls started business with a ninety day divorce law several years ago. A horde of matrimonial misfits from the four quarters of the country immediately swept down on the little town. Among them were representatives of wealthy eastern families. This class of business was new to the local lawyers and they were somewhat flustered as to the size of the fees they could extract from these millionaires; for not knowing how long the rush would last they were determined to charge all the traffic would bear. A fatherly looking attorney handling the case of one of the first of the string of wealthy New York women, was selected by his fellows to try out the size of a fee on her. The day after her divorce was granted she called at his office to ask his charge. He wrinkled his forehead, fumbled the papers on his desk and finally, unable to face her, he swung around in his revolving chair and mumbled "$10,000." "How much?" she inquired, not being able to see his face. "Er—$10,000," he repeated. Dead silence followed. Then the nervous attorney, unable to bear the strain any longer and thinking his client might have fainted at the amount, turned slowly in his chair. Very calmly she was writing out a check and very sweetly she handed it to him with many thanks for his celerity in obtaining the decree. With gloomy countenance he reported straight back to his fellow lawyers and silently spread the check before them. A whoop rang out as the figures were displayed and the company smote him heartily on the back with many congratulations for setting such a splendid scale. He listened to them dejectedly, "Boys," he said, "I can never forgive myself. I could have made it $20,000 and got it just as easily. I'm afraid I've ruined the business."

In the Good Old "Squatting Time"

In an obscure newspaper paragraph was recorded last week the death of John Wilson, a Vallejo pioneer. Casual allusion was made to the aid which he rendered to Captain Frisbie during the squatter troubles. Though the "squatting time" has been buried in the oblivion of forgotten years, it was one of the most exciting episodes that troubled the tenor of existence in California, and possibly, had it occurred at any other period than when the national attention was absorbed in the struggle of the civil war it would have found its way into history. It abounded in episodes, tragic and comic, that might well receive the attention of the Great Californian Novelist. Captain Frisbie, who was a son-in-law of General Vallejo, owned large tracts of land which were held under a Spanish grant. Early in the sixties, when so many of these old allotments were in dispute, one claim overlying another, to say nothing of the undoubted frauds by which many of them were obtained, it was noised about that Captain Frisbie had no valid title to any of his holdings, and straightway everyone, of all ages and both sexes, set forth to acquire real estate. Town lots as well as farm land were considered fair game, and anything even suspected of belonging to a Frisbie or a Vallejo was seized upon. While some went about it methodically and with system, having definite idea of what they wanted and how to proceed, the majority were possessed of nothing more than a wild desire to grab something. Household furniture was broken up to furnish the necessary "stakes" in the shortest period of time, and many a "smart" householder made a bed on the floor in order to utilize the slats and posts in "squatting." Kitchen chairs and tables were ruthlessly demolished. The housewife frequently received a breathless message from some barefooted urchin, at noon hour, giving her directions where to appear with a midday meal, since it was imperative for the man to seize his hour and "squat." Likewise the head of the family might return to find a locked door, a cold stove and a notification that wifie had "gone squatting," since he was so negligent of the golden opportunity. Children played at squatting as they did at war and politics. Though there were neutrals amongst the adults there were none amongst the infants, some of whom made a virtuous practice of pulling up every stake they encountered, while others religiously planted whatever seemed to their childish comprehension as big enough to answer the purpose. As some of the genuine squatter's stakes were nothing more than the rungs of kitchen chairs or spokes of old wheels, and as the surveying was for the most part pure guess work, there was on hand the material for some beautiful land wars anywhere within ranging distance of youthful Vallejo. Farther out, on the Sacramento and Solano plains numerous tragedies grew out of the rival claims. All this was in those idyllic times before the advent of the railroad and the telegraph, when news from the outside world arrived via the Panama steamer,—once a fortnight. In due course of time communication was had with the authorities at Washington, Captain Frisbie's claims were acknowledged by the government, and the "squatting time" was over.

Such a Cultured Man!

If there's anybody in Berkeley who feels about Browning as Douglas Jerrold felt about him it's his or her own fault. It will be remembered,—by those who have heard the story—that when Jerrold first read "Sordello," he was convalescing from a serious illness. Sentence after sentence brought no consecutive thought, and presently Jerrold was seized with a great fear. Thrusting the book into the hands of his wife he eagerly demanded what she thought of it. He watched her intently as she read, and when finally she exclaimed, "I don't understand what this man means," Jerrold uttered a cry of relief and exultation. "Thank God," he said, "I am not insane." As William Lyon Phelps of Yale has been expounding Browning at the Berkeley Summer School and as he could be heard at two bits a throw, as they say on the campus, it is reasonable to surmise that fresh impetus has been given to culture in the college town and that almost any woman you meet over there can explicate the most obscure passages in "The Ring and the Book." I have heard that there was a woman in Berkeley who thought that Pacchiarotto who worked in distemper was a dog, but I am sure she has been enlightened out of that misapprehension, for I am told that Professor Phelps brought Browning down to the level of even the low-brows. And for doing so he is greatly esteemed; also for being so cultured. The ladies looked to him for enlightenment on every conceivable subject. One day at a tea in Berkeley, a distinguished matron exclaimed, "Oh, I am so glad Professor Phelps is coming; I want to ask him about the immortality of the soul." And she did. The ladies petitioned the Professor to return during the winter holidays. This was after they had given him a thirty-dollar silver trimmed writing pad. He said he would come back and give a three weeks' course for $1,000. The ladies are thinking it over.

The Bohemian Jinks

"The grove-plays of the Bohemian Club in their present type, which they have reached only after a gradual development of thirty years, present what must be acknowledged to be a significant phenomenon in art." Assuredly they do, and for that reason, if for no other, we should be grateful for being permitted to glimpse them between book covers even if only in the form of synopses as they are presented by Mr. Porter Garnett in his very creditable treatise entitled, "The Bohemian Jinks." The foregoing quoted dictum is from Mr. Garnett's preface, and it is worth while quoting further: "That this growth toward something distinctive should have taken place here in California, where we are sufficiently far away from the rest of the world, and whither sophistication in art reluctantly pervenes, is, in a way, extraordinary; and yet it is our very isolation that is at the root of the creative impulse displayed in these forest dramas." And it is something to be proud of, that here in California this creative impulse has found the kind of appreciation and encouragement essential to artistic fruition. "The Midsummer High Jinks," says Mr. Garnett, "have carried the name of the organization over seas until, among a certain class of persons in every part of the world, it is as familiar as that of the city in which it has its home." But, "unfortunately the annual encampments of the Bohemian Club are associated in some persons' minds with the license of a Dionysiac revel, and the woodland performances with which they end have been given a factitious celebrity which militates against their serious consideration as works of art." This is quite true, and therefore Mr. Garnett's treatise, in the course of which is given the interesting history of the inception and development of these sober and edifying revels will go a long way toward dispelling an unfortunate misapprehension while at the same time rendering accessible to students of dramatic literature much that is worthy of their attention.

"The Sons of Baldur"

This is the week of the annual midsummer jinks. Herman Scheffauer is the sire. He is also the author of the grove-play for this year—a forest music-drama, he styles it, entitled "The Sons of Baldur." He has summoned the Bohemians to the grove in these stirring lines:

> From ruts and rounds of brazen-footed toil
> Where souls flag heavily in howling marts
> And peace is price of time, from counters gilt
> As much with blood as sweat of bartering
> And shocks endured when bruising Traffic binds
> Your bodies to his maddened chariot-spokes,
> From launching of new ships of enterprise
> And arduous travail fixed in many spheres,
> Unto the pure, thrice-sainted Grove your Sire
> Now calls you straightly. Hearken and attend.

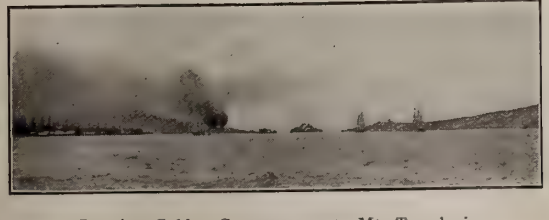
By Way of a Boost

"Boost—don't knock," the slogan of the Daily Globe is apparently refreshing to the ear of the populace. From the reports of the circulation manager and the tales of the newsboys the policy of the new evening journal is evidently the very thing the doctor ordered. Apparently a protracted diet of the journalism that savors of spleen and inspired vindictiveness has proved nauseating to many thousands of people. The Globe came into existence at the psychological moment when the bored and surfeited were threatened with nervous prostration, and it received a very cordial greeting. The paper is clearly devoted to the best interests of the city, and it should receive the hearty support of everybody. It should especially receive the support of the merchants who have yet to recover from the effects of a car strike instigated by an infamous band of journalistic conspirators.

"Jim "Budd of Stockton



From all sections of California to the city of Stockton friends of the late James H. Budd journeyed last Sunday to attend the funeral of the ex-Governor. John W. Mitchell made the trip from Los Angeles, Governor Gillett and Judge Shields came down from Sacramento, James H. O'Brien, Major Harney and William F. Herrin went up from this city and Frank Drew from his home in Alameda. Almost every county in the State was represented by somebody who knew "Jim" Budd, and who loved him for those rare, delightful qualities which make friendship worth while. Having been governor of California it must be inferred that Jim Budd had a few enemies; it was impossible for him to appoint to office everybody who wanted a job. Moreover he was not one of those unctuous statesmen who try to please everybody. But there were many whom he did not please who were nevertheless very fond of him. Among them were men who had observed the charitable side of his nature, who had seen how superficial was his hatred, how readily he forgave an injury and how sympathetic he was towards the victims of ill fortune. They prized his friendship and deeply they mourned his death. And it was this tender emotion awakened by the death of the man who had inspired so noble a friendship, which animated the pilgrimage to Stockton last Sunday. Not in a spirit of captious criticism but merely by way of inciting to reflection on the frailty of ties that bind in politics I take occasion to observe that the only men conspicuous by their absence from the funeral were men whom Governor Budd appointed to public office.

When He Removed Irish

Budd's first political quarrel after entering the gubernatorial office was with Colonel John P. Irish who was then a trustee of the Blind Asylum. Irish had long been at war with the "Old Bills" of Alameda County and as soon as Budd was elected they demanded Irish's scalp. Budd was not at all disposed to gratify them. I heard him confess once that he had no relish for a controversy with Irish. Sensible of the doughty Colonel's talent for stinging comment he was reluctant to make himself the object of that gentleman's hostility. But the "Old Bills" were insistent and implacable. "I asked them," said Budd, "if they'd be willing to take the Colonel on in the event of a row. And they assured me that they were aching for a chance at him. So at the expiration of Irish's term I filled the office with another man, and Irish turned loose. I looked for the 'Old Bills' to come to the front, but you couldn't find hide or hair of any of them. They left me to stand the brunt of the onslaught." In the controversy that ensued Budd explained that Irish's successor was a poor man, that he had rendered much party service, that he had a large family and needed the job. Whereupon Irish suggested, "Why not add blindness to his other qualifications and make him an inmate." Nobody enjoyed this witticism more than did Jim Budd.

His Interest in Murder Cases

During Budd's term of office nothing gave him greater concern than applications for commutation of sentence in murder cases. He was ever fearful that an innocent man might be hanged, and in cases of circumstantial evidence he instituted the most searching investigations. I recall that in the Durrant case he read the whole record, visited the scene of the murders and interviewed witnesses. Just before the day set for the hanging a prisoner in San Quentin announced that he was the murderer. But when the man was interviewed it was made obvious that he was not telling the truth. From his description of the church in which the bodies were found it was evident he had never seen the building. In a case from one of the northern counties the principal question involved was whether a spot of blood on the accused's trousers was human blood or the blood of a beast. A chemist pronounced it human blood. After the man's conviction Budd employed three other chemists to analyze the blood. Two of them said it was not the blood of a human being. Governor Budd was seriously thinking of commuting the sentence. He called on the prisoner and said: "I've had three other experts' opinion on that blood and they say that—" The prisoner interrupted: "It's a lie. They are all —— liars." Budd was convinced that this was the unguarded cry of a guilty conscience," and he refused to interfere.

Heney and Marat

The case of the Hon. Francis J. Heney in its current aspect reminds me of an episode in French history, the protagonist of which was a patriot whose aspirations and method of achieving them were somewhat similar to those of our own darling, picturesque hero. I refer to the triumvir Marat, who, with Robespierre floated France in blood. Half-dwarf, prurient romancer, rancorous libeller, envious and revengeful, the blood-thirsty Marat struck at all above him with dog-like ferocity and insatiable malignity, in the name of the people calling for "heads." Those whom he hated he pointed his finger at and promised them the guillotine. And all the while his feverish cries for slaughter were regarded as the exhalations of an exalted patriotism. Well, Marat as we all know, came to the end of his rope, but, (and this is the principal point of dissimilarity in the two cases) he was not found out until after his death. But as he lived by the knife, so he died, and the people mourned him as a martyr. They decreed him Pantheon honors. Mirabeau's dust made way for him. Presently in his voluminous writing was discovered a passage advocating monarchy. The man who hated royalty as Heney hates graft was himself a royalist. Forthwith the people's friend was burnt in effigy and the urn containing the ashes was borne through the streets with ribaldry and execration and flung into a sewer in the Rue Montmartre.

Getting His Own Medicine

Mr. Heney has not yet been burnt in effigy. But perhaps it has not yet been made clear to the people that he deserves to be. So far he resembles Marat principally in his method of vindicating his patriotism. And he reminds me of Marat because like the Frenchman he seems destined to have his career ended by the very weapon which he employed for his sinister purposes. Mr. Heney has been running amuck for nearly two years brandishing the weapon of personal abuse and using it with vindictive fury in the hope of silencing criticisms which he knew to be just. Now he is having a taste of medicine akin to his own unsavory nostrum. But the dose that is being administered to him has a certain merit which cannot be claimed for what he dispensed. Facts are being poured down his throat to induce regurgitation of the truth while the reluctant patient retching violently stubbornly thwarts the doctor. Hitherto facts have not seriously concerned Mr. Heney; nor have they been prized by him as a staple of controversy. This peripatetic orator never scrupled against employing misrepresentation or gratuitous calumny in his declamatory excursions through the state. To that perverted taste for the depreciation of their fellow-creatures which is peculiar to a very large class of men Mr. Heney has catered with the enthusiasm of a purveyor of salacity appealing to the prurient appetite of the debased and degenerate.

An Ugly Figure

Mr. Heney, therefore, has been getting precisely the punishment that fits his crime. And doubtless the blistering of him is gratifying to minds of the same order upon which he relied for approval. And now, whether he is all that the Examiner imputes, is a question that interests me less than the lesson which his case affords. According to my view of his general conduct as a rancorous prosecutor, voiding his bile up and down the state, emitting blasts of denunciation from pulpit and rostrum, with his choler always in a state of ferment and his lineaments distorted in corrugations,—according to my view this is a figure far more repulsive than the one the Examiner has drawn by innuendo for the entertainment of its readers. For after all a grafter is rather a commonplace rogue. A frenzied reformer of the Heney type is unique. Besides, the crimes that flow from cupidity are not the worst. Far more mischievous than graft is the confusion of the public mind as to justice, decency, humbug, pretension and patriotism. And more to be desired than the punishment of a grafter is the awakening of the ideals of good breeding and social intercourse. I know nothing more deplorable in the recent history of this state than the obsession of the people with respect to Heney. We have seen this coarse individual acclaimed in churches and universities by people who pride themselves on their intelligence and refinement, but who either were unable to differentiate scurrility from argument or preferred not to do so. Here was an unhumorous Bardolph, who had coined his tongue for guineas and his jaw for drachmas, exhibiting in temples of culture the manners of a swashbuckler in an Eastcheap tavern, frankly answering argument with personal abuse, asserting things in disparagement of his critics without proof or the slightest pretension that proof existed, and all the while evoking the plaudits of the multitude.

Suppressed By Newburgh

The obsession with respect to Heney appears to have been dispelled. He is not yet dumb, for his fountain of falsehood has not dried up, but his poison bag has been punctured. Incidentally his reputation as a courtroom bully has been shattered. When he took the Ruef case into the police court ostensibly to perpetuate Gallagher's testimony but in reality to defer the trial until public sentiment could be inflamed again, he was guilty of a great tactical blunder. For in the police court it was possible to confront him with a man who would not scorn to play at his own game. There he went up against Attorney Newburgh and that gentleman went at him hammer-and-tongs fashion and actually drove him out of court. And now that Heney is about down and out I feel towards him as that gentle quaker felt who, finding a dog in the act of robbing his larder, disdained rough modes of punishment, but said he would content himself with a parting admonition; upon which, opening the door to the dog he cried after him, "Mad dog! good people, a mad dog!"

The Hotaling-Miller Incident

Not being in the confidence of Mr. Henry Miller I do not know whether he appreciates the free advertising which he contrived to get out of the ebullition of temper provoked by Mr. Richard Hotaling, but as he is a manager as well as an actor I am inclined to the opinion that the box-office sheet will render him sensible of a debt of gratitude to the man who stirred his choler. For even actors of the keenest artistic sensibilities are susceptible to those emotions which are most grateful to the sordid financier and the thrifty captain of industry. From the standpoint of the press-agent Mr. Miller is deserving of the highest commendation for the artistry which he has exhibited in promoting publicity through the simple expedient of rearing a mountain out of a mole-hill. As for Mr. Hotaling, being aware of his amiable temperament and his freedom from rancor, I am convinced that he presumed, on the strength of acquaintance with Mr. Miller, to affect sentiments which he did not feel, not supposing that they would be taken seriously. But the joke is on Hotaling. It was a case of not knowing it was loaded. But Mr. Hotaling should have known, being as he is in touch with affairs theatrical. Mr. Miller, though an artist, is not to be trifled with. A few years ago when, after being highly praised by a few provincial critics for a performance of "Camille" which he and Miss Anglin gave on the road, he ventured into New York, and there the critics told him the truth. And the artistic Mr. Miller flew into as great a rage as he did when he read Hotaling's letter. And he denounced the critics from the stage. And the critics laughed at him.

Thelen Quits the League

According to Warren Olney, chief counsel of the Western Pacific Railroad in California, that corporation is not to take a hand in politics. Which probably accounts for the rumored retirement of Max Thelen from the councils of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League in Berkeley. Mr. Thelen is a Western Pacific attorney, and he has been the very head and front of the Berkeley leaguers. While this young attorney may be able to keep out of politics, it is far from likely that the corporation which he represents will be able to do so—Mr. Olney to the contrary notwithstanding. Apropos of Max Thelen's rumored abandonment of the reform movement it has been remarked that to prove himself a sincere and consistent leaguer he should withdraw from the legal department of the Western Pacific. For, it is explained, the leaguers have been vehemently affirming that no self-respecting citizen can afford to have any connection however remote with that abomination of the financial world, Mr. E. H. Harriman. Now, it appears, the iniquitous Mr. Harriman, is the dictator of the Western Pacific as well as of the Southern Pacific, having jockeyed the Goulds into the subservient position of henchmen. In the circumstances the Western Pacific will be hardly anything more than an auxilliary of the Southern Pacific, and therefore the distinguished civic patriot of Berkeley should have conscientious scruples against so odious a connection as that which has been established between himself and the wizard of Wall street.

Spring Valley's Presidency

The election of William Bourne to the presidency of the Spring Valley Water Company was doubtless most gratifying to the stockholders of the corporation; not only because of his ability as a financier, but also because as a result of his stepping in Captain Payson steps out. For Captain Payson has not achieved much in the presidency, and as the water company is now passing through a crisis the stockholders feel there should be at the helm a man of energy with genius for straightening out difficulties. Captain Payson is a fine old gentleman, who, though he was educated for the army, doesn't relish being under fire. And these are hot times for the water company. Its financial affairs have been somewhat chaotic. When Captain Payson was elected to the presidency after the fire on the strength of the Parrott holdings, he was expected to do things, but nothing has been done. The presidency has probably been on Captain Payson's nerves, and I have no doubt that he yielded his seat to Mr. Bourne with the grace of a cavalry officer swinging himself out of a saddle. But Captain Payson is not going into retirement. He will continue to manage the Parrott estate, an interest in which he acquired by marriage.

Little Hayes of the Marathon

Jack Hayes, who won the toughest and most heartbreaking race in the world, the Marathon, in the recent Olympic games, London, is only 19 years old, a slim, nickeled steel athlete from his toes to the crown of his head. He stands just a shade under 5 feet 4 inches and weighs 125 pounds. Long before he sailed with the American team for London, he was confident of winning the race. As he expressed himself, "I've been training my head and legs ten years for a chance at this Marathon and I know I can win. The only runners that will press me will be the men of my own team. That Canadian Indian Tom Longboat, who is cracked up so high by the English, will fizzle at twenty miles. I intend to go right out with the pacemakers, dog their heels till near the finish and then sprint to the line." Hayes followed this course and passed three men in that final sprint. The over-touted Longboat fell at the wayside at twenty miles, just as the little runner forecasted.

How He Ran to Fame and Fortune

Two years ago Hayes went to work as a messenger boy in Bloomingdale's big department store in New York. He pegged along through various jobs till just before he sailed for the games when he was getting twenty dollars a week in the superintendent's office. His victory in winning the historical Marathon has given his commercial value an immense boost and when he gets back to New York Bloomingdale is going to put him at the head of the sporting goods department at a salary of $4,500 a year. This sudden lift into athletic fame has come to little Hayes only after hard and indefatigable training. For years it was his ambition to win the Marathon and for years in and out of season he was persistently training towards that end. Incidentally he gathered up an armful of trophies for distance running. He worked all day in the store, and Sunday and at night were the only times he had to train but nothing could check his ambition. He rigged up a quarter mile track on the roof of Bloomingdale's big store and with the stars looking down he used to reel off mile after mile and build up his stamina while other athletes were sleeping. He entered several of the Marathon races run in the vicinity of New York and Boston and gradually forged up among the finishers. It was in one of these local Marathons that Tom Longboat, the Canadian Indian, made his reputation. Longboat ran the distance in 2 hours 24 minutes and 20 4-5 seconds, smashing all former records. Hayes was a plucky third in 2 hours 30 minutes and 38 seconds. His finish in this race attracted the approval of close students and leaders in the National Amateur Athletic Association and they kept an eye on him. In his next race he finished two miles ahead of his field. Since then he has ranked among the American topnotchers. England prides herself on being particulary strong in distance runners and counted confidently on capturing the Marathon race. Before the games the American managers said very little concerning the runners they had entered for that classic event but with Hayes, Foreshaw, Welton and Tewanina in quiet reserve they knew they would surprise the athletic world in the finish—and they did.

A New Theatrical Combination

According to a local amusement manager the theatrical powers—which means the biggest of the syndicates and the strongest of the vaudeville combinations—have decided that there are too many theatres in the country and their representatives are going to meet in New York this week and eliminate, crowd out, or suppress whatever houses or theatrical enterprises they deem unnecessary. It's a case of big fish eat little fish, a survival of the fittest, only as the big fish are to be the judges in the case the little fish are placed in very much the same position as was the canary with the cat. To stave off competition is said to be the explanation behind the move. It is known generally that last season was a poor one in the theatrical business and that the syndicates failed to clean up their regulation big profits. Again during the recent good times "opera houses" and theatres sprung up like mushrooms in cities ranging in population from fifty to one hundred and fifty thousand. Many of these theatres and opera houses are now lying idle, offered at cheap rates, and speculators in various forms of amusements are likely to rent them and open up in opposition to the trusts and combinations. The bars are to be put up so that these adventurers shall not get feeders for such shows.

To Close Strings of Theatres

As far as can be ascertained the first plan suggested was for the big combinations and syndicates to contribute a fund with which to pay sufficient rent to keep picked theatres in the most important cities and towns closed. The vaudeville combinations are strong supporters of this suggestion because they do not wish these idle properties to become the homes of popular priced dramatic or musical stock companies, the element of competition engendered by such organizations being very considerable. The intention all along the line is not to have property lying around loose for any adventurous or anti-trust spirit to set up shop at a reduced scale of prices, and thereby continue to threaten demoralization to carefully nursed trust prices. That this general plan has been under consideration by the trust magnates for some months past is born out by the fact that a well known local manager when asked about his dates said, "I've got them signed for several months, but winter dates seem more or less befogged just now. My New York agents write that I must wait awhile till certain things in the East are straightened out and that the business will be cleared up in ample season. I gathered from the letters that the generally poor business of last year had brought about a necessary readjusting of dates all along the line." How much this proposed new deal of the syndicate, providing it goes through, will affect the local theatres remains to be seen. Like all the western cities San Francisco is dependent on the East for its main theatrical provender. Several firms here, backed by local capital, divide the theatrical business among themselves more or less. Since the big fire a number of newcomers have broken into the field and have shifted the business somewhat.

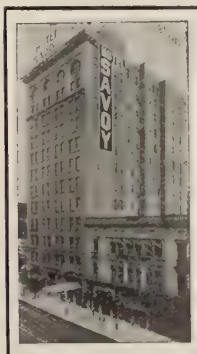
Dingee Park

By far the finest suburban residence tract on the peninsula, "Dingee Park," has just been re-subdivided and is now offered for sale by its owner, William J. Dingee. It is located only thirty-six minutes from the depot at Third and Townsend streets, this city, and two minutes walk from the depot in Redwood City. Its transportation facilities are being added to constantly. The Peninsula Electric Railroad has bought a right of way along the edge of the Park and construction of this convenient line will soon be rushed to completion. The county road connecting San Francisco and San Jose, the best and most important motor road in the State, runs along the front of the tract. The Park is now being rapidly developed in street work, ornamentation and other valuable improvements. All of the streets are to be graded, macadamized and to have cement curbs. About 30,000 square feet of cement sidewalks have already been laid. A complete water system is to be added to the tract. Mr. Dingee will construct a reservoir in the foothills back of the property and deed it to the City. The main water pipe runs directly through the tract. The sewer pipe is being laid and will be completed as fast as homes are erected. Nothing is being neglected to make "Dingee Park" an ideal spot in which to live.

THE FINANCIAL OUTLOOK

By R. E. Mulcahy



If there is any one left who now doubts that a genuine bull market in Wall Street securities is not in full swing he must surely be hard to convince. Starting early in December last, securities began to show signs of advancement. They acted very much as a sick child would act before starting to mend; every little change one way or the other dealt directly with them, but their recuperative powers appeared stronger, and after every weak spell the market rallied to a higher level. While the price showed only a small gain yet it was at a higher level than the previous high market. This condition has prevailed ever since December last. At this writing fresh new high levels have been reached with indications of the market taking on a runaway aspect. Railway earnings, while under those of last year at this time, are not so bad as many would lead us to believe.

The strong feature to the stock market at present is the urgent demand for bonds; this condition has but recently made itself felt. It is always a good plan to buy stocks when the bond market shows strength. There are many conditions this year to make securities at present prices very attractive. The high prices for farm products, the wealth of the American farmer, and the general prosperity of many lines of trades, all go to show a very bright future. This year the corn crop will be three billion bushels; wheat, eight hundred million bushels; oats, one billion bushels; cotton, fourteen million bales. The barley, hay, potato and other crops will be bountiful. The prices for all crops are very high. Foreign countries will require more of our food products this year than ever before. With such conditions why should any one borrow trouble regarding the future? The upward tendency of Wall Street securities might be temporarily halted, but that a higher level will be reached in the near future goes without saying.

It is a noteworthy fact that railway supply manufacturers are showing a big increase of orders on their books. This brings employment to many men. This further means an increased general distribution of money, thereby expanding the trade of many quarters. We hear more confidence in the prospects of the future than we did a short period ago. Optimism is returning, the country is growing rapidly. The consumption of our products is increasing faster than most of us imagine. Something must be done to further promote our production, irrigation and the like. Our gold and silver outputs are showing a very satisfactory increase. After considering these significant facts which stand without contradiction, does it seem reasonable that our eyes should be closed to actual conditions, and that we should listen further to the chronic growler? It is beyond doubt that this country is starting upon a campaign of the greatest prosperity in its history; the signs are too plain to be mistaken.

The Bohrmann-Miller Engagement

The engagement of Miss Madeleine Bohrmann to H. Clay Miller was no surprise to her friends as Mr. Miller fell a victim to cupid's arrow almost at the first meeting four years ago in Sausalito. Miss Bohrmann is a stunning blonde, brilliant in conversation, accomplished in manner and widely connected with some of the best families in the State. She is a granddaughter of the late Charles Kohler, well known in business and musical circles. He was among the first, many years ago, to establish the Loring Club here. Miss Bohrmann was born in New Jersey, and came to California a few years ago on a visit to her aunts, Mrs. Willis Davis and Mrs. Bauer, and her cousins, Mrs. Foster and Mrs. E. Van Bergen. With her sister, Miss Elizabeth, who is a noted musician, she has made her home at Alta Mira Villa, Sausalito, for the past two years. H. Clay Miller is the son of the late H. Clay Miller, brother of the late Senator John F. Miller. Mrs. Frank Findley, who was formerly interesting Rose Miller, is a sister of the prospective groom. H.

MISS CLARA CLEMENS

Miss Clemens, the daughter of Mark Twain, has just made a successful debut in concert in London and her charming mezzo-soprano voice is being highly praised by the critics.

Clay Miller, Sr. has been dead many years. His widow still resides in the old home in Sausalito. The Millers are related to Mrs. Dulee Bolado Ashe and many prominent Spanish families in Monterey. The wedding will take place at the little church in Ross Valley, September 5th. A reception will follow at the magnificent country home of the Charles J. Foster's, "The Hacienda," Ross Valley. The maid of honor will be the bride's sister, Miss Elizabeth Bohrmann. The four cousins of the bride, Misses Edna and Sidney Davis, Miss Mina Van Bergen and Miss Marie Louise Foster will be the bride's maids; while William Bohrmann, the bride's eldest brother, will give her into the keeping of the groom. The engagement ring is a magnificent solitaire encircled by sapphires, the birth stone of the bride. After an extended wedding tour the bride and groom will spend the winter in an attractive apartment in this city. Miss Bohrmann will be the guest of her cousin, Mrs. C. J. Foster, in Ross Valley until after the wedding.

Betrayed by a Postal Card

Several of the garages in this city have established an elaborate system whereby the owner of a machine may feel comfortably sure that his auto is not out without his permission. At one new garage a report is mailed every day telling the hour and number of times the machine leaves and enters the building, and as a consequence a well known young matron played the leading role in a farce comedy. Fitted to the opposite role was a young woman who has recently been visiting in San Francisco. As the dainty little ingenue, trailing an almost imperceptible odor of gasoline behind her she has made a great hit with a select audience. The matron recently gave a luncheon in honor of the fair young visitor at a country club, and after the festivities she generously provided one of her machines for the guest of honor and several other young women. The day after the luncheon she received a card from the garage notifying her that that particular machine had turned in at 2 o'clock in the morning. "Aha!" said the matron, or words to that effect, as she buckled on her gum shoes and slipped to the telephone to unravel the mystery. Each occupant of the car insisted that she had in turn been deposited at her own door, leaving the distinguished young visitor to be taken to her hotel at about six o'clock in the afternoon. Considering the matter settled, the owner summoned the chauffeur and put him on the carpet. The chauffeur was haughtily dismissed from her service—and then hired over again after he managed to cram an explanation into an interstice of silence. He had not taken the young lady directly to her hotel but instead, at her order, had driven her down the avenue on a shopping tour which had lasted until the dinner hour. Then he was told to wait outside the hotel, while she dressed for dinner, and in due time the young lady and her mother appeared and were driven to a fashionable residence where a dinner dance was in progress. He was then commissioned to attend to several errands for them, as they were leaving town the next day, and at midnight he reported again, and when they were ready he drove them to their hotel. Naturally he thought his employer had put the machine at their disposal. The chauffeur's story proved true in every detail and a lively chuckle was enjoyed by those who had shared the automobile with the young woman who commandeered it for her own purposes in such a royal fashion. Of course the story did not long restrict itself to that particular set, for an episode so saturated in gasoline is too highly explosive to keep in close confines.

Still Figuring on a Bridge Scandal

A summer without a bridge scandal would be like a mint julep with tinned mint, and for a time it looked as though we were going through the dog days without a single reputation going to the bow-wows via the sociable bridge tables. But the other day an amiable little breeze blew up, down Burlingame way, and every one that told the story fanned it along until it resembled a nice, grown up squall. But I am assured by a discriminating person that really the thing was all a horrid mistake, that the miscalculation was a matter of questionable arithmetic not morals. It happened two afternoons in succession to be sure, but as the amount gained by the tally keeper would not pay her French laundry bill for a week, it is stupid to suppose that she would soil her hands with a paltry unearned increment at the bridge tables. As a facetious writer on bridge recently remarked, "the participants generally play a rubber of three games, and then spend the rest of the evening doing sums in simple addition to find out who won. Tonight they will find out who won last night's game, but they will not find out who won tonight's game until some one remembers to bring home another tablet of scratch paper." No doubt the lady whose blunders started the comments in Burlingame is not proficient in the mathematics which bridge entails. An old school mate was vigorously defending her the other day and pointed her appeal for justice with, "why, everyone knew she would have been cinched in algebra at school if her people weren't so prominent. But of course the principal wanted her name on the graduation programs and so they passed her mathematics."

Colonel and Mrs. Marion P. Maus will move into their quarters in the Presidio this week. A number of social functions have already been planned for their welcome.

Still on the Invalid List

Friends in California are very worried over the reports that come from the sick bed of Esther Chamberlain, who with her sister Lucia, has won a comfortable place in the eastern magazine field. These clever sisters are nieces of Mrs. Mary Curtis Richardson, the portrait painter, and their girlhood was spent in San Francisco. They are also related to Mrs. Thomas Magee, Sr. and Mrs. Denis O'Sullivan. Many of the characters in their drawing room stories wear thin disguises which can easily be recognized as cousin Germain to some of our own fashionable celebrities.

May Wed in California

A society woman who has just returned from the East brings back the report that Mrs. Nathalie Schenck Collins is engaged to Mr. De Wolf Cutting and Newport would not be surprised to see them slip off to California to be married. Just why they should come out here for the ceremony is a mystery unless it be that Mrs. Collins has contracted the habit of marrying in California. Her first affair, which turned out so unhappily, was consummated out here, without any of her large following to applaud the performance. Now, if rumor be true, with a short entra acte in the East, she will again use California scenery for a background.

Considered a Beauty

Every time Mrs. Nathalie Schenck Collins appears in print she is placarded as a "beauty," and possibly she lives up to the noun as gracefully as most of the beauties featured in the press. But people who know Newport tell me that she is really considered lovely by her fashionable peers. San Francisco women may lack finish, and that indefinable smartness which characterizes the Newporter, but when it comes to sheer physical beauty, the New York standard is far below the variety we grow out here in the west. If Paris began here he would have to say "there aint going to be no core" by the time he came to consider the claim of Newport. I remember that the day the steamer sailed for the Orient with Captain Collins, his bride and the Jersey cow, which the Captain took along to insure pure milk on the way, a Bohemian Club wag happened to be down at the docks. The distinguished party was pointed out to him and solemnly regarding the trio he asked "which one did you say was considered a beauty?"

Invited to a Royal Party

From letters received in Burlingame lately, I learn that this season the Queen has not signaled out any California girl for special attention. Miss Marguerite Le Breton, who was a recent visitor here, owes her social success largely to the fact that Queen Alexander, after Miss Le Breton was presented at court, asked that she be invited to the next royal garden party. Many are presented but few are chosen for such an honor and this year the list is particularly unCalifornian.

Motor Parties at Del Monte

Monterey correspondents write me that there was quite a bevy of San Francisco society folk at Del Monte last week. Mr. and Mrs. Robert L. Coleman, accompanied by Mr. and Mrs. George Almer Newhall, motored down from Burlingame and spent the week-end. With them during the most part of their stay was Mrs. Henry Stevens Kiersted who came over from the Presidio of Monterey and who was recently the house guest of the Colemans at Burlingame.

Mrs. A. C. Miller of Berkeley, together with Mrs. Robert Herrick, spent a few days here last week. Mrs. Herrick is the wife of Professor Herrick of the University of Chicago who came out here to take charge of the deparement of economics at the summer school at Berkeley.

Mrs. C. C. Clay, Miss Madeline Clay and Miss Harrold were at Del Monte for a short visit recently. From here they went to Santa Barbara and Coronado.

Mrs. Samuel Knight joined Mrs. Charles G. Hooker and Miss Hooker here for a few days' visit last week. Mrs. George H. Lent and Miss Land motored down with the Hookers for a week.

Mr. and Mrs. Horace D. Pillsbury are among those spending the summer here.

Mrs. W. T. Swinburne went up to town several days ago to join Admiral Swinburne who has just returned from a trip north with the "Charleston." While in the city she has been the guest of Mr. and Mrs. Cuyler Lee. Mrs. Swinburne will leave the latter part of the month for Honolulu. It is possible that Mrs. Emile Bruguiere will accompany her on the trip.

Mrs. J. D. Peters of Stockton and her daughter, Miss Anna Peters, are here for a month's stay and will be joined on Wednesday by Mrs. C. L. Six, who was Miss Genevieve Peters.

A jolly automobile party that arrived on Saturday to spend the week-end included Captain C. McKinstry, H. R. Simpkins, P. W. Selby and Eugene B. Murphy.

Among those who motored here recently were F. E. Booth who brought with him Mr. and Mrs. W. S. Booth of Chicago; Mr. and Mrs. A. W. Beadle and Mr. and Mrs. C. Adams who made the trip from San Francisco; Mr. and Mrs. Byron Mauzy and Miss Marjorie Mauzy; Mr. and Mrs. L. W. Walcott and Van K. Walcott of Berkeley, accompanied by Mr. and Mrs. M. B. Carter and R. Brace Carter of Los Angeles; Mrs. Thomas R. Lyon, Mr. and Mrs. John W. Gary of Chicago who made the trip from Pasadena to join Thomas R. Lyon, Miss Lyon and Miss Dickerman; Mr. and Mrs. William Ede, William Ede, Jr., and Mrs. Catherine Ede, Dr. H. A. Rowell, Mr. and Mrs. E. C. Bartlett and Miss Van Guedepe.

These young matrons are cousins and have brought back from the East numbers of stunning gowns in the new modes.

The handsome Livermore house on Russian Hill has been rented to the Chamberlain's of Santa Barbara. Mrs. Chamberlain was Miss Edith McDonald, daughter of Mark L. McDonald of Santa Rosa. The Livermores will leave for Europe early in October where they will join Miss Beth Livermore and the family will spend a year in travel.

Mr. and Mrs. R. A. Holcomb, Grace Thompson, have just returned from their wedding tour spent at Tahoe Tavern. They are occupying their cottage in Belvedere where they will remain until late in the fall.

Recent letters received in this city from Dr. Arnold Genthe give an interesting account of his travels. He is traveling alone with the exception of two servants who carry camera and photographic supplies. He goes on to say that he had not met a single white person in the mountains which demonstrated the fact that he had selected the right haunts of the natives. He reports having to contend with stubborn difficulties in getting good results with his negatives on account of the damp heat prevailing. He is now in a part of Japan unfrequented by tourists. His plans carry him ahead several months yet and no definite date is set for his return.

A supper of unusual interest was given by Mr. Henry Miller in the Red Room of the Hotel St. Francis last Friday, to the distinguished players who have been appearing in the notable series of performances under his management at the Van Ness. Mr. Miller is a delightful host and inspired his brilliant guests to a play of wit and fancy that made the evening memorable. Present at the table were Mr. C. Rann Kennedy, author of "The Servant in the House," and Mrs. Kennedy; Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Gottlob; Mr. Percy MacKaye, author of "Mater"; Miss Hazel MacKaye; Miss Isabel Irving; Mrs. Thomas Whiffen; Miss Laura Hope Crews; Miss Gwladys Wynne; Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Lewis; Mr. Bertram Harrison; Mr. Walter Hampden; Mr. Tyrone Power; Mr. Galway Herbert and Mr. Edward Rann Kennedy.

Miss Roberta Thompson of Palo Alto, whose engagement has just been announced to George La Farge of Vancouver, B. C., is the daughter of the late Frank Thompson, brother of the late Thomas L. Thompson, Minister to Brazil, and brother of Mrs. William B. Craig. The family connections in this city are very large. The wedding will take place this fall. Mr. La Farge is a relative of La Farge, the famous artist.

Miss Maude Bourn will leave next month for an extended trip through Europe. Before returning next fall she will visit a number of friends scattered about the continent. Miss Bourn will spend next winter in New York where her mother, Mrs. W. B. Bourn plans to take a house for the season.

Wellington Gregg joined his family in Nauheim, Germany, last week.

Suites for the fall and winter have been engaged at the Hotel Jefferson by Mr. and Mrs. C. Mason Kinnie, Mr. and Mrs. W. L. Washburn, Mrs. W. W. Young and Miss Ella Young, Mrs. N. A. San Rafael Development

By L. V. Stanton

San Rafael is to be the Tuxedo of California. So sayeth some of its active citizens who are also among the most active citizens of California. They have taken hold of things in Marin County and are giving great impetus to its vital affairs. They say, too, that what has long been a dream respecting the future of San Rafael is to be realized—that it is to be a bay port with water communication by steamer with San Francisco, Oakland, Berkeley and all the bay towns, and then it will become again what it was in the days of the Pardres the health resort of the coast. San Rafael was one of the five original missions of Northern California, and thither the Missionaries sent patients suffering from bronchial troubles.

The men who are devoting their energies to the development of San Rafael are the men who organized the San Rafael Development Company. Among them are Wm. Babcock, Geo. M. Pinckard, John F. Boyd, Frank S. Johnson, A. W. Foster, John Martin, Frank B. Anderson, George Heazleton, Chas. R. Bishop, and many others. Some time ago they purchased from James L. Flood some 650 acres of land lying between San Rafael and the bay front, covered with oak, madrone, laurel, pine, redwood and buckeye. This property they are developing, and now in the center of the tract are the spacious grounds and home of the San Rafael Country and Golf Club of which George M. Prickard is president. This property lies in the flat. Surrounding the Country Club property, in the form of a horseshoe, are rolling hills covered with woods. At the open end of the horseshoe is the Bay of San Francisco. The rolling hills which surround the Country Club tract are being rapidly purchased by wealthy people in lots of from 3, 10 and 20 acres. The view from these hills across the Country Club grounds, looking towards the bay, is surpassingly beautiful, and many lots also have a view of Tamalpais Mountain.

The club house of the Country Club is situated near the center of the tract on a knoll surrounded by oak trees. The building is nearing completion and will be ready for occupancy in two or three weeks. The club house is one hundred and ten feet long and some fifty feet in depth, the center portion being two stories, and architecturally without question it is the handsomest club house in California. It was designed by Fred H. Meyers, the well-known architect. Adjacent to the club house is a large concrete swimming tank some fifty by ninety feet into which salt water will be pumped by electric power daily. To the front of the club house beyond the home, Golf Green, are situated the large tennis courts. Still further in front of the club house is the San Rafael Creek, which has just been dredged by the San Rafael Development Co., permitting of five feet of water at low tide and some eight feet at high tide. This creek affords over a mile of canoeing.

Among the features of the club house are a salt water plunge, and out-door dining room beneath the oak trees. This house will be opened in a few weeks with a ball, and thereafter it will be the center of social activity in San Rafael.

The people who have been buying home sites in San Rafael of late have been securing tracts of 100, 150 and

ON THE GROUNDS OF THE SAN RAFAEL COUNTRY CLUB

250 feet frontage, and they have been building beautiful homes. But of course there are smaller villa lots aplenty.

Two lines of railroad now serve the city of San Rafael —the narrow and the broad gauge—and it is expected that the Hotaling road will shortly be built into San Rafael. This will give the city three lines of rail communication. The development of the San Rafael Creek under the auspices of the San Rafael Development Company and with the assistance of the town authorities will make possible in a few months of sternwheelers within the city limits of San Rafael. The dream of San Rafael that it will become a bay port will then be realized. It is only a question now of two or three months before this development will take place.

The mountains and landscapes are irresistible; the grandest beach on the coast of California is located in Marin County, and is comparatively unknown owing to the lack of proper facilities in reaching it. As yet, no railroad has sought to go over or through the mountain, and the only means of reaching this choice spot is by stage from Sausalito or San Rafael. The ride in itself is interesting and exciting, as the coast road from Sausalito skirts the cliffs and overlooks the ocean from dizzy heights. Visitors soon become enchanted with the gorgeous scenery and gaze in awe down the precipitous cliffs. For many miles the road continues to follow the rugged coast line which has been the scene of many a disastrous wreck, and finally a glimpse is obtained of the wonderous beach which is pure white and makes a perfect picture as the old ocean peacefully breaks upon it.

Bubbling from numerous springs on the slopes of Tamalpais comes a clear, sparkling flow of pure mountain water, the best to be found in the State. This water is caught and distributed to the people of southern Marin. It is even bottled and sold in San Francisco, the mere fact that it comes from this county being a sufficient guarantee of its purity. A mammoth dam is now in course of construction which will hold sufficient water to supply the needs of the county for many years to come. Lake Lagunitas on the western slope of Mt. Tamalpais is now the source of supply for the San Rafael district.

The soil of Marin County produces the finest apples in the west. This industry has been neglected owing to the dairy interests which have made Marin County famous.

The finest cheese in the State is made in Marin County and the exports of butter, eggs, chickens, milk and cream is immense and is growing rapidly.

There has never been a lack of water in the county and irrigation has never been found necessary. The depth of the soil, its retentive nature, and ample rainfall in winter, render artificial watering unnecessary. The soil of the county is easily worked being heavily charged with the elemental constituents of plant life, admirably suited to horticultural purposes, and wherever worked to fruit it yields heavily.

The area of Marin County is 516 square miles or 330,000 acres. San Rafael is the county seat. Novato is the center of the fruit district. Point Reyes is the center of the dairy interests. Southern Marin is the section of suburban residence. Two railroads transact the business of the country and a third railroad will soon have its terminus near Belvedere.

Marin County today is in a particularly prosperous condition. The placing of large tracts of land on the market has been the means of attracting a desirable element to locate there permanently. Rapid trains and fast ferries make it possible for the merchants or the mechanic to live in Marin County and do business in the city. Picturesque and prosperous Marin County has every advantage to offer home seekers and heartily welcomes them.

J. FRED SCHLINGMAN'S RESIDENCE, MILL VALLEY.

CALIFORNIA LAUREL, MUIR WOODS, CAL.

Only within the last few years, however, has attention been directed to Marin County as a place of permanent residence and in these few years great changes have been made. Towns have sprung up almost in a night, peopled with that most desirable element, the unit of which is the man who owns his own home. For many years Marin County's development was retarded by an obsolete railroad, a narrow gauged affair, with little engines that wheezed and stuffy little cars that creaked and a time-table that even the President of the road was ashamed to see in print. Notwithstanding all of which Marin County, (thanks to its unsurpassed scenic attractions and equable climate), progressed surprisingly. And meanwhile the little old narrow gauge railroad with its weather beaten rolling stock has been transferred to new owners and the road transformed into an up-to-date third rail electric system, with large and brilliantly illumianted cars of modern design and a half-hour service to San Francisco. The result is that every town in southern Marin is rapidly doubling its population.

In conclusion let me say that the crowning beauty of Marin is her hearty welcome for the worthy, no matter how humble their lot.

"Mater:" Its Initial Production

"Mater," as played at the Van Ness Theatre, is a charming, idealistic comedy, but it is too attenuated in spots and lacks fibre. Poetry is made to cover lack of action. Perry MacKaye has handled his materials from the viewpoint of a poet, an idealist, and has laid on his colors in masses over broad stretches and they fail sometimes to blend and connect. Vivid minded himself he has left much to the imagination of the less fertile brained individual. However this task of filling in the thin spots is evidently very readily accomplished by the intense admirers of Mr. MacKaye and the ideals he stands for. There is only one character in the play "Mater." The role radiates with a vivifying comedy spirit and, in Isabel Irving's hands, is the whole show. It is easy to understand now why Henry Miller sent for her to create the character. In hands less light, less deft the production would have run to smash before the close of the sluggish opening first act. Henry Miller's role was in nowise strong enough to step into the breach. As a character "Mater" is decidedly original and whimsically delightful, a creation that Barrie, with all his train of half human fairy folk, might envy the author. But her elf-like spirit of fun, wit, sprightliness and imagination, which might circle rare flights of comedy endeavor, are set in the surroundings of an idealistic son and daughter, who, despite their subtle inconsistencies, have about as much comedy spirit and texture in their make-up as the stage props. Senator Cullen and the young lover offer only a thin relief in comedy coloring and this is mainly due to the clever way in which the two roles are handled. "Mater" is a widow, "fair and forty," who might easily be mistaken for the sister of her grown son and daughter, as she is by Senator Cullen who wooes her under this error. Both son and daughter are intensely idealistic. The son aspires to go to Congress as a "reformer." Senator Cullen, political boss and arch manipulator of the election returns, alone stands in his way. The mother learns this fact and in her practical, common sense, fun hurdling way overrides all opposition in order to reach the Senator and win his influence. This she is able to do through Cullen's recently awakened ardor to gain her hand. The Senator, though blinded in a measure by love, is still worldly wise enough to know that his chances of success depend on the way he exchanges his political influence for her hand. Politician and mother cleverly fence over the stake and all the wit besprinkling the comedy crackles in the interchange. The son suspects what is going on and in his melancholly Dane fashion bitterly opposes any compromise with Cullen and what he stands for. Incidentally the Senator's notes and flowers to the mother are mistaken by the boy lover as intended for the sister and a tiff ensues between the young couple. Isabel Irving has certainly added to her successes in the sprightly and delightful way in which she plays the part of "Mater." It is an exquisite bit of sparkling, deft and dainty light comedy, given with the nicest and surest of touches. It will be a matter of keen regret if the play is not strengthened in its action and in the coloring of its subordinate characters so as to insure success and thus afford Miss Irving an opportunity to win in the part the distinction she deserves. The role of Senator Cullen is sketchy but Henry Miller infuses into it a foxy, unctuous manner that gives it a being. A less clever actor would have portrayed the lines in broad comedy, something to delight the groundlings; such a coloring of the part would not have held for a moment the attention of a woman with the fine perceptions of "Mater." Mr. Miller carefully represses any impulse to "cut loose" and quietly and adroitly plays up to Miss Irving's conception of "Mater." Thus he harmonizes his own part with the leading character and illustrates again, as he has so frequently this season, his conception as a stage manager of a well proportioned and finished production. Frederick Lewis' portrayal of the son, that half mad reformer in politics, is cast in too glomy a mold by half and he can do no better than begin by reforming himself. Mr. MacKaye is undoubtedly responsible for much of this Hamlet like dementia by endeavoring to voice some of his personal ideas of the way the coming political millennium should be reached. Such extended flights belong in the North American Review rather than in a stage production of this character. One has only to compare the charmingly, poetic sentiments expressed by "Mater" to catch the distinction. Incongruities of character may be necessary in developing comedy but there is no call to run hazards with radical examples that threaten the life of such a promising production as "Mater." Hazel MacKaye has a deal to do in portraying the role of the daughter before she will attain the requisite flexibility and color. Charles Gotthold puts all the life and virility possible into the lines of the lover. The one setting of the play is simple and in excellent taste.

HENRY MILLER AS SYDNEY CARTON

—Raymond Stock.

Revival of "The Only Way"

What promises to be the most popular attraction of the entire Henry Miller season at the Van Ness Theatre will be the elaborate revival of "The Only Way" on Monday evening next. The dramatization of "A Tale of Two Cities" scored a big hit many seasons ago, when it was first presented by Mr. Miller and his company, as a strikingly picturesque and wonderfully clever footlight version of that masterpiece by Charles Dickens. "The Tale of Two Cities" has always been recognized as the strongest of all Dickens' novels from a purely dramatic sense. The central character of Sydney Carton, with his strangely contradictory traits of drunken recklessness and brilliant eloquence, his redemption through love and his supreme self-sacrifice for the sake of that love, affords Mr. Miller the most delightful and impressive of all his character creations. He has been importuned time and again to revive this play but has been unable to do so until now, owing to the many new productions and important stage work of his recent career. The incidents of the play are dramatically absorbing and the exchange of the one prisoner for the other is always greeted with enthusiastic applause, just as is the spectacular scenes of Carton's definance of the French Assembly. Mr. Miller has taken special pains to make this revival as scenically rich as possible and has selected a special cast for its interpretation. There will be matinees Wednesday and Saturday.

Stirring Play at the Alcazar

At the eleventh hour the Alcazar management substituted "Soldiers of Fortune" for "Monsieur Beaucaire" as their next offering, commencing Monday night, because of the popular demand that the dramatized version of Richard Harding Davis' tale of adventure be presented ere the White Whittlesey engagement expires. San Francisco's playgoers evidently have not forgotten the hit made by Mr. Whittlesey in "Soldiers of Fortune" half-a-dozen years ago at the old Alcazar—a hit so pronounced that Belasco and Mayer adopted the play as a vehicle for his starring tour over the western circuit. Its scenes are laid in an imaginary South American Republic, where the usual revolution is in progress. Mr. Whittlesey has the role of Robert Clay, a thoroughgoing young American who is serving as engineer and manager of a mine owned by the father of the girl he loves. The action mainly hinges on his efforts to preserve the property of his employer from ruination by the clashing armies, and from first curtain-rise until the finish there is not a dull moment. The rival leaders try to extort money from him and he euchres them at their own game. They get him into some very tight fixes, but his ingenuity and pluck always extricates him in the nick of time. In the last act it looks as if he and his compatriots are done for, and the audience involuntarily sighs relief when a United States warship lands its crew and routes the enemy. In the cast with Mr. Whittlesey are all the Alcazar favorites and an army of supernumeraries as sailors, soldiers and revolutionists. Among the players most happily cast are Bessie Barriscale in an ideal ingenue part, Howard Hickman as the revolutionary leader, Fred J. Butler as Clay's staunch ally, Louise Brownell as a haughty Spanish dame, John B. Maher in a comedy role that fits him like a made-to-order glove, Burt Wesner as the mine owner, Ernest Glendenning as an impetuous American boy, Herbert Farjeon as the president of the republic, and Anita Murray as the heroine's sister. Each of the four acts has an appropriately tropical setting, and the stage pictures promise to be very picturesque and pretty.

An Entertaining Series of "Travel Talks"

Manager Will L. Greenbaum announces for his first attraction of the season Mr. Lloyd Scott, a famous traveler in a series of "Travel Talks" on foreign lands. Mr. Scott is a brilliant scholar, a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania, and one of the few Americans bearing the title of "Doctor of Jurisprudence" from the University of Heidelberg. Although educated for the law Mr. Scott has devoted almost his entire life to travel and photography and has a most wonderful collection of beautifully colored views which in conjunction with moving panoramas and motion pictures will be used to illustrate his interesting tales of travel. The subjects for the first series will be "India," "Egypt," "Russia," "Japan," and "Ireland." Next spring Mr. Scott expects to make a tour of Mexico and the South Sea Islands for new material. It is the intention of the management to make the Lloyd Scott "Travel Talks" a permanent western institution to cover the same field that the Burton Holmes Travellogues do in the East. Occasional visits will be made to the eastern cities and in return the Burton Holmes Travellogues will be given in the West. Following this series of entertainments Mr. Greenbaum promises Signor Emilio De Gogorza, the splendid Spanish baritone, whose success when here with Emma Eames was tremendous.

"The Girl From Paris" at the Princess

For the week beginning next Monday night the Princess offers a captivating programme in "The Girl From Paris." This delightful production has not been given here in a long while. It is well remembered as one of the most enjoyable of musical comedies and abounds in bright and witty dialogue and sparkling and catchy music. Beautiful scenery and costumes have been prepared and a cast has been selected which cannot fail to give satisfaction. May Boley will be at her happiest in the soubrette role of Ruth, and Evelyn Frances Kellogg will have the best opportunity yet afforded her as Mlle. Julie Bonbon, "The Girl From Paris." Sarah Edwards will have as Mrs. Emeline Honeycomb a fine character role and Zoe Barnett is happily cast as Norah. William Burress should be thoroughly at home as Hans, the proprietor of the Spa Hotel, Schloffenburgen which Louis Man created in the original New York production. As Major Fessdyke Arthur Cunningham should shine lyrically and dramatically. That sterling actor, Reginald Travers, will make his reappearance and play Mr. Ebenezer Honeycomb, a shining light. Wallace Brownlow, the splendid baritone, whose last appearance was at the Tivoli, has been specially engaged for the role of Tom Everleigh. The remainder of the cast is composed as follows: Algernon P. Dusie, Charles E. Couture; Percy Tooting, Jack Tobie; Cecil Smythe, Harold Abbott; Alfred Hubert, Laurence Bowes; Angela, Grisella Kingsland; May, Maybelle Baker; Gladys, Gertrude Alzora; Maud, Nina Payne; Ethel, Lola Hansen; Edith, Lydia Crane; Violet, Lois Armand; Rose, Ellen Crane; Amos Dingle, Walter de Leon; M. August Pompier, Walter Catlett; Gretchen, Myrtle Dingwall; Anna, Ella Kearny; Fritz, Daun Seaton; Louis, Robert Leonard; Blatterholler, Hubert Whitehead. "The Chaperons" will be given for the last times this Sunday afternoon and evening.

The Orpheum announces for the week beginning this Sunday matinee a programme of rare merit, novelty and variety. Franklyn Underwood, one of the greatest dramatic favorites we have ever had in this city will make his first vaudeville appearance and prsent a clever and amusing one act comedy, entitled "Dobb's Dilemma," which was written especially for him. He will be capitally supported by Frances Slosson and George Bloomquest. Mike Bernard and Blossom Seely will make their first appearance in this city and judging from the flattering reports which have preceded them from the East their efforts will prove a great treat. Mr. Bernard is a phenomenal rag time pianist and Miss Seely is an exceptionally clever and diverting singing and dancing comedienne. The Tennis Trio consisting of Will Campbell and May and Alma Stock will present, in a beautiful and picturesque Japanese Garden drooping with wistaria, an original and novel juggling act in which it is said they completely eclipse all their predecessors in their line. Campbell is a perfect marvel and performs the most extraordinary feats and one of the sisters does some capital baton juggling while the other is an expert with the clubs. They are both very pretty girls who costume beautifully and tastefully. Fay Carranza, who has been specially engaged for one week only, is a gifted young soprano. In the opinion of some of our best musicians she is destined to win fame in the near future. The great success which she lately achieved in concert at the Greek Theatre, Berkeley, is well known. Next week will be the last of Jesse L. Lasky's spectacular production, "The Military Octette" and "The Girl With The Baton"; Ines and Taki, and the Dancing Mitchells. Will M. Cressy and Blanche Dayne will also conclude their engagement with this programme. They will say au revoir in Mr. Cressy's funniest one act play, "Bill Biffin's Baby." New Orpheum Motion Pictures will conclude the performance.

In the Limelight

One of the early attractions for the Van Ness Theatre will be the latest musical comedy to capture New York, "The Girl Question."

Out of deference to hundreds of requests it is not unlikely that Henry Miller will offer a few performances of "The Great Divide" before the close of his season at the Van Ness Theatre.

"The Man of the Hour" company will leave New York next week, coming direct to this city. Brady and Grismer have especially engaged Cyril Scott to play the leading role during the Van Ness Theatre engagement.

Miss Carranza, who will be the attraction at the Orpheum next week, made her successful debut here two years ago. The only teacher she ever had was Senor Joaquin S. Wanrell.

The Personal Equation in Selling Books.

This story is told of the power of the personal equation in matters which influence the public in selling books. A publisher had printed a first edition, 1,000 copies, of a little book which both he and his readers thought was a good thing. Six months after publication only about eight hundred copies had been sold and the title was scratched off the lists as not worth a second edition.

Returning from Boston one day this particular publisher had read all the newspapers forward and backward and was looking around the parlor car for something to suggest an occupation for another hour when his eye fell upon a local sheet carelessly thrown on the floor.

Picking it up and glancing through it his eye fell upon a report of a speech made by President Roosevelt the day before at Bangor. In that speech the little book which had been such a disappointment to its publisher was mentioned, in fact it was recommended to everybody.

Two hours later the accuracy of the report of the speech was verified by telegraph, and then followed a vigorous advertising campaign, exploiting the President's indorsement of that book. Result: 280,000 copies of it were sold within a year. The book was Wagner's "Simple Life."

"'Then I noticed with astonishment and pain that my husband's work was almost at a standstill. Huge paintings were begun, but remained uncompleted. All creative energy was sacrificed in the tumult of our love, converted into mild subjection or dreamy happiness. It seemed to him the greatest sacrifice to leave me at all, and so he neglected his studio for days. If I accompanied him to his atelier and remained with him when he began to work, his energy and will would soon turn into childish longing that forced him into my arms. Nothing would awaken him; and when I reminded him earnestly of the past and the future, of all the hopes that were centred in him, he would declare with a laugh that one must either drink or die of thirst.

"'All of his friends spoke of the change that had taken place in him, and I was generally charged with the blame. Violent, warring emotions possessed me, and I must admit that in addition to my love I had a certain sense of satisfaction because the man I loved placed me above all things. But out of this tumult of feeling arose a resolution that mastered me: I must help my husband.

"'I began by leaving him much to himself, and his love flared all the more imperatively. When I told him seriously that I did not wish to be the cause of his ruin, and that we must agree to separate for a time, he assured me that no power on earth would keep him from suicide. I tried in every way to make him return to his former life, to reawaken his energy, but I succeeded only in drawing him closer to me. Then in the fever of my dilemma I hit upon a plan to estrange him. I would change his admiration into contempt by proving to him that I was unworthy of his idolatry.

"'At that time a young doctor was among the frequent visitors at our house. Before my marriage he had informed my father that he was in love with me and had asked permission to press his suit. Now that I had been taken out of his life he sought every opportunity to be in my company. Never before had I given him more than a fleeting thought. In the delirium of martyrdom I encouraged this doctor in a way that could leave my husband in no doubt whatever.

"'My plan succeeded. Struck by the lightning bolt that made our past love seem a ghastly dream my husband repulsed me in silence. My former reticence he now interpreted as the satiated indifference of one who was longing for a new toy; and he thought of the interruptions to his career as an unworthy sacrifice. Then he left me. I bore it all silently; there was not a sob left in me. I seemed to stand on an altar on which an eternal sacrifice was offered up. But later, after he was really gone and I could not find him again, I wandered day and night in the rooms that he had left, tortured by an insane longing.'

"'My act,' she continued, 'was not without results, for after a few months I received news of my husband's further success. He had controlled his sorrow and had found the way back to his art. Those were my happiest hours. Whenever I saw in the newspapers accounts of his fame or of the success of one of his paintings I knelt and cried until there came over me a sense of numbed quiet that is the greatest boon to wounded souls. But in those nights I suffered as no woman before me ever suffered. What spiritual happiness can ever make amends to me for the torturing knowledge that my husband thought me guilty, an outcast!'

"As she spoke to me thus, the grief in her cried out aloud. And her first hour of actual peace must have come only a few days afterward, wnen we placed her on her bier."

The professor ceased speaking and took his hand from his eyes. When he arose and approached the painter he was alarmed at the sight that confronted him. "What is the matter?" he asked excitedly.

Braganza did not answer. He paced about the room unsteadily and, as though led by unseen hands, went from one picture frame to another. This room was not, after all, the mere amusement of a cynical old scoffer, who painted his pictures in his own mind's eye. Here in this room his wife, whom he had long since regarded as lost, had been born again and now lived for him in shimmering glory, a great and patient soul. What were all his former successes and failures in comparison with the treasure that had been discovered in this room, whose walls were hung with empty frames!

For a long time he remained silent, unable to find a word to break the spell. Then he grasped the professor's hand and looked into the blue eyes of the old man.

"I must go now," he said simply, "but not until I have thanked you a thousand times for what you have told me. I mean to thank you in a manner more worthy—I mean to paint your 'Confession' just as you see it when you stand solitary before this frame. Then both of us will gaze at her features together, for then we will be able to do so without closing our eyes. I mean to make it real and beautiful, if God will give me strength."

"I doubt that you will be able to paint the likeness of those features so plainly as they exist in my memory," said the professor, smiling.

But he was surprised by the painter's voice as he cried: "Don't judge too hastily, my dear professor. Sometimes during the long, silent hours of the night the gentle, noble features of a woman come before a man's vision so vividly that in the morning he can paint them with faithful exactness."

Auto Notes

P. B. Roberts and family of Palo Alto have gone to Sherwood, Mendocino County, in their two-cylinder Buick touring car to spend a vacation of several weeks.

Probably a world's record for mileage was established when the tires on a car belonging to P. F. Goyet of Woodland passed theh 25,000 mile mark. Mr. Goyet writes the Diamond Rubber Co. that two tires of their make have gone over that distance and are still good, one having only worn down to the breaker strip, while the other has not even worn through the tread.

Charles E. Lutz and a party of his schoolmates have returned from a pleasant outing of several weeks in Mendocino County in his father's two-cylinder Buick touring car. Although a rather diminutive driver Charles had no difficulty in making the somewhat difficult roads.

Governor Gillett and Mrs. Gillett, with their son, returned from a trip to Eureka last Wednesday, coming by way of the automobile stage line in the Thomas Flyer. They are most enthusiastic over the scenery as viewed from an automobile.

The Consolidated Motor Car Co. report the sale of two Pope-Hartford touring cars during the past week, one going to J. E. Clifford of Stockton, and the other to A. F. Patnott of Hanford.

The Franklin car continues to grow in popularity with physicians, the latest purchaser of one of these cars being Dr. Phillip King Brown.

The Pioneer Automobile Company report the sale of a thirty-five horsepower Oldsmobile to Waterman Brothers of Fresno.

The latest purchaser of the Buick "White Streaks" is Dr. F. R. Orella, who took delivery of one of the natty little machines on Monday from the Howard Automobile Company.

O. W. Greenewald spent his week-end vacation at Santa Cruz. He made the round trip in his Buick model "S" in company with three gentlemen friends.

R. H. Zacharais, who recently purchased a Thomas Forty car, reached the city last evening in company with his two sisters, having driven from their home in Westley. Mr. Zacharais has had his car about two months during which time he has done considerable touring through Stanislaus and Modesto counties.

The Pioneer Automobile Company have just received a report from the stage line running from Sacramento to Fair Oaks. This line has been in operation six months. In order to accommodate twelve people, the tonneau was taken off a Thomas Flyer and the chassic used with a specially built body. The distance to Fair Oaks and return, to Sacramento, is eighteen miles and the car has successfully accomplished three trips per day for the entire six months.

Another message from Percy J. Walker, who is touring Europe in his Thomas Flyer, has been received by E. P. Brinegar of the Pioneer Automobile Co. Mr. Walker was spending a few days in Venice and evidently enjoying himself perfectly.

J. E. Scotford of this city has just purchased a sixty horsepower Thomas Flyer from the Pioneer Automobile Co.

A. W. Mariner, one of the directors of the Lake County Stage Co. plying between Pieta, Lake Porte, Soda Bay, and Lakeport, says he believes that within the next two years all the large stage lines on the coast will use automobiles. His company recently bought a Thomas Flyer as an experiment, and he claims it is paying much larger dividends than the old horse stages. Everybody prefers riding in the automobile on account of its ability to cover the ground quickly, and also because it affords much easier riding. The Thomas has not varied five minutes from its schedule time in two months.

Mr. George Young of Modesto came up to the city on Friday and returned with one of the new Model M Oldsmobiles.

The Pioneer Automobile Company report the sale of a sixty horsepower Thomas Flyer to C. U. Zelle.

One of the largest four cylinder Franklin machines, the same type that made a perfect score in the Glidden Tour, was sold and delivered yesterday to Frank G. Snook of Sacramento. This makes the second Franklin car Mr. Snook has owned.

It is of particular interest to note, in spite of many kinds of statements to the contrary, that tires have not kept pace in improvement with the automobiles, the average cost per car for tires on the Glidden 1700 mile tour this year is about 40 per cent less than in the previous year's test. The Diamond Rubber Co. have kept an accurate record of all tire expense in the Glidden tour and the figures just compiled show that where the average cost of tires per car last year was $27.47, this year it was but $16.88. This, of course, on cars equipped with Diamond Tires. The other makes averaged $135.00 per car for 1907 and $64.94 for 1908. The Diamond Rubber Co. therefore, feel particularly proud of the low cost of tire up-keep on their goods as compared with other makes.

Novel With Local Scenes

Mary Austin might have called her recent novel "When East Meets West," for it is essentially a study of what the respective sections think each of the representatives of the other. "Santa Lucia" concerns itself with the life of a little college town in Santa Clara valley where everything is more or less dominated by a denominational college which, in turn, is dependent for its existence on the benefactions of an elderly, childless couple who are bent on perpetuating their own names and narrownesses. East is ably represented in the person of a young professor of biology, recently imported, who brings with him the New England idea that "Culture" makes a caste of its own; and also by Mrs. Evan Lindley, the wife of the attorney for the trustees of the college, herself an Eastern woman, a college graduate and erstwhile a teacher. She, too, has the narrow, specialized views which admit no shade between pure black and absolute white. Lindley, a Californian, accustomed to taking long looks into the future and perhaps, long chances, and who revels in the present and the new, strikes some serious domestic snags. Mrs. Lindley, with her training and caste of mind, would have made the ideal wife for the college professor. Professor Stair must needs fall in love with and marry a Californian who, influenced by ambition and the future she thought she discerned for him counted on his being recognized and called to one of the state universities where she could shine and glitter in a society worthy of her. Professor Stair was engaged in writing a book which he hoped would win him recognition and preferment. Unfortunately, in the prosaic publishing world the opinion was diametrically opposite. Mrs. Stair had no interest in the book itself but only in its success and the results thereof. Julia Stair would have made a better wife for Lindley, for ultimate success, if not too long deferred, would have atonned to her for immediate short comings. Lindley made the mistake which over-kind husbands have made since the beginning of time, of saving his wife from annoyances by keeping her in ignorance of the precise standing of his business, and as a result finding him seriously involved in debts, her "New England" conscience immediately saw in him only dishonesty. Fortunately, however, she had other characteristics, amongst them an economic mind and an executive head, and out of their misfortunes they found each other. In the Stair household matters went the other way. Julia began speedily to regret the gayer life she might have enjoyed had she married her other suitor, and to see in herself only the poor, abused and misunderstood wife who was justified in cutting all her knots, freeing herself and beginning again. While the two families started on practically even terms, and the fortunes of each were dependent on the view and conduct of the wives, one attained while the other distintegrated.

At this late date there is no necessity to dwell on the literary excellence of Mrs. Austin's style, nor will any of her readers assume that in "Santa Lucia" there is nothing more than an old fashioned parallel of the good vs. the bad. The scene shifts from the Santa Clara valley to San Francisco and back again to San Mateo and thereabouts. It may be merely our local prejudice, but sympathy is decidedly with the western characters as against their eastern brethren. Though "Santa Lucia" makes no claim to being a Californian novel in the sense of attempting to reproduce the life as lived in the state at large, it is a faithful picture of one small corner of the commonwealth. Published by Harper and Brothers.

A New Alaskan Novel

Rex Beach's second novel of Alaska should lose him none of the popularity he gained in "The Spoilers." It deals with the primitive life of the northland, the hardy pioneers who first dared its isolation, and the coming of civilization and the law, likewise with love under difficulties. The backbone of the novel is the question whether an army lieutenant of southern blood and chivalric traditions shall marry the girl who has won his heart, despite her strain of Indian blood, and in so doing, inevitably cut himself off from his own family, with nothing to expect in his profession but ostracism by his brother officers. He has seen the thing done too often not to comprehend it in its fulness. Necia, who knows no other life than that of the trading post and the mission, and who has been accustomed all her life to the mixed and irregular families of the frontier, neither divines nor comprehends Burrell's scruples. The barrier which seems to separate them so inevitably is removed by the story which John Gale relates to the lieutenant. The romantic interest is supposed, perhaps intended to be concerned with Necia and Burrell, but there is a blithe, light-hearted little French Canadian, 'Poleon Doret, who has known Necia since her childhood, and who has loved and waited in silence. When we have reached the "happy ending," wedding and all complete, our hearts follow 'Poleon—'Poleon, hiding his broken heart and singing his gay French chansons as he paddles down the river in search of that mystical "New Land" which has always called him. Incidental to the mere love story we are invited to take part in a stampede, to assist in the establishment of a new mining district and its laws, and to look on while a new town springs up as by magic, gambling saloons, dance halls, and all the accessories, as well as to make the intimate acquaintance of some of the unique characters who are always to be found in the lost corners of the earth. Flambeau, the name by which the new town is called in the story, is Rampart City, at whose birth Mr. Beach assisted. Though the story is not itself a transcript of history its characters are by no means all myths. Published by Harper and Brothers.

"Little Women" as Popular as Ever

The dearth of good books for young girls who are in the period of development which lies between the age of fairy tales and that of grown-up novels is once more emphasized by the announcement that another special edition of Louise Alcott's "Little Women" is to be brought out at once. As the publishers state that the issue is to be "limited to one hundred thousand copies," it is evident that the demand is yet unlimited. "Little Women" was first published in 1868 and it has been virtually without a competitor ever since. The third generation appears to enjoy the performances of Meg, Joe, Beth and Amy as much as the first did, and there seems to be no reason to assume that the sixth will not be as the third. "Little Women" has been translated into all the foreign languages and appears to enjoy its popularity abroad as much as it does at home. Anna Chapin Ray, whose girl stories are also brought out by Little, Brown & Co., is the only other writer who comes within shadow of Louise Alcott in this particular field. The new edition is to have illustrations by Edmund H. Garrett. It is to be hoped that he will not deck out the "little women" in modern costume, for, however perfect his drawings may be, however interesting as pictures of pretty and dainty little girls, as soon as he forgets the hoop skirts which even the toddling babies were encased in, the hair nets and white hosiery and the shapless baggy sacques and the hats of the period, his pictures will cease to be illustrations.

SOPHIE C. OLSEN, Plaintiff,

vs.

OSCAR J. OLSEN, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIfornia, send greeting to Oscar J. Olsen, Defendant.

YOU ARE HEREBY REQUIRED to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, on the ground of defendant's willful desertion and willful neglect, also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

GIVEN under my hand and the Seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 28th day of May, A. D. 1908.

Chalmers-Detroit

"TWENTY-FOUR"

THE NEW CAR Price, $1650.00

CHALMERS-DETROIT TOURING CAR. PRICE, $1650.

This Astounding Car for $1650.00

We take pleasure in announcing the latest addition to the CHALMERS-DETROIT (formerly the Thomas-Detroit) line. This new car will be known as the CHALMERS-DETROIT "TWENTY-FOUR." The production of a high-grade car at this price marks an epoch in automobile construction. Never before has any factory ATTEMPTED to build a car embodying as many up-to-date features at anything near the price. This car is the result of TWO YEARS' experimenting, and is now offered to the public as a finished product—NOT an experiment. Three of the new cars have already been run over 7,000 miles. Other makers are astounded at this move on the part of the factory. Other low-priced 4-cylinder cars will probably follow the advent of this new marvel——BUT—LOW PRICE is one thing, but LOW PRICE COMBINED with QUALITY is another. This car is not a "cheap" car in any sense of the word. No car at $2,000 to $2,500 can approach in finish, smoothness or luxury. WE HAVE NO COMPETITION. Please note that this car is NOT A REHASH of old parts, or a reduction in price of a car now on the market. Other makers may follow with a low price on UNSALABLE cars and HOLDOVERS. BUT CONSIDER the features YOU want in YOUR car. Then read the specifications.

SPECIAL FEATURES

Now let us compare the mechanical features with some high-priced cars.

The four cylinders are cast together, as in the latest Fiat, the Darracq and a score of great foreign cars.

We use the Unit Power Plant, as in the new Decauville, the Motobloc and others. Motor, clutch and transmission form a single unit, so they cannot get out of alignment.

The body is suspended, for easy riding, after the style of the Mercedes. The valves are like those of the Napier. The three-quarter Elliptic Springs are like the Renault and others.

As completely fitted with annualar ball bearings as the Mercedes, Hotchkiss and Renault. Very few of the costliest American cars use so many. The actual cost of the ball bearings in this car is $103.

Brakes heavier than we used, until this year, on our "Forty." anti-backing device to protect you on hills.

The lubrication system which is now used on the "Forty," and which is being adopted on all leading cars. A multiple disc clutch—similar to that used on the Isotta, Fiat and many others. The gas intake is water-jacketed, to save you the trouble arising through cold gasoline.

Floating type rear axle, used heretofore only on the HIGHEST-PRICED CARS. Wheels, 32 inches; tires, 3½ inches.

So simple in control that a novice can master the car in ten minutes.

DELIVERIES.—Deliveries will be exactly as promised. We have standing orders for 25 cars per month, beginning August 1.

Other makers will talk about their low-priced cars, show you blue prints, and deliver "hot air." Our cars are built and we will deliver the goods.

PRICES $1500 F. O. B. DETROIT—Touring Car, Runabout (Searchlights, generators, gas lamps and tops are extra.) Made by CHALMERS-DETROIT CO., formerly E. R. Thomas-Detroit Co. This change in name involves no change in ownership, personnel or management. It is simply made to avoid the confusion of two Thomas concerns operating on separate lines.

Our Home For The Indigent

Editor Town Talk: Have you nothing to say on the subject of the new home for the indigent presented to the wealthy city of San Francisco by the gentlemen who had charge of the money sent to this city after the fire for the relief of the sufferers? I think there are many people who would like to know whether there was strict adherence to moral principles in the handling of that money. The men by whom it was handled were trustees appointed to relieve suffering and distress and to aid all persons who were in need of aid. They were not authorized to enrich a municipal corporation out of the funds. Have they not been guilty of a breach of trust?

—A Constant Reader.

A strict constructionist will doubtless hold that the gentlemen who presented the new home for the indigent to the city may be very justly reprehended for giving to the city what they should have given to the victims of the April calamity. But they had the money on hand, it was not to be expected that they should return it to the persons from whom it was received, and in the circumstances nobody will be inclined to censure them severely for making all the taxpayers the beneficiaries of the trust. On the contrary, perhaps they should be applauded for winding up their trust in spite of the fact that there was sufficient money on hand to maintain a large staff of salaried employees. The temptation to prolong the trust must have been very strong. In all probability the bank which had the good fortune to be chosen treasurer of the Relief Committee viewed the gradual diminution of the big fund with poignant emotion, and doubtless would have liked to profit therefrom for an indefinite period. So from a survey of all the aspects of the matter we conclude that it is advisable to swallow with no audible murmur the humiliation to which as taxpayers of San Francisco we have been subjected by the trustees of the relief fund. We must observe however that it was unfortunate that more of the money was not spent for relieving distress and less for salaries and red tape. The trustees have made a splendid record as financiers and bookkeepers, but when we recall some of the heart-breaking episodes of the bitter days of 1906 we are not at all disposed to felicitate them on having saved sufficient money to build a home for the indigent.

Mayor Taylor's Brief

The Hon. Edward Robeson Taylor, one day last week, after a refreshing automobile ride at the expense of the indulgent taxpayers, dashed off a brief ostensibly for the purpose of demonstrating that the renascence of the horse car is a phenomenon for which the people should be profoundly grateful. Without the slightest diminution of our respect for our venerable Executive we harbor the suspicion that an esoteric purpose animated this somewhat jejune production. It occurs to us that in a moment of intellectual exaltation the Mayor undertook to remind his loving constituents that he is a lawyer as well as a poet, and that it is as easy for him to ratiocinate like a polemic as to rhapsodize like a child of the Muses. But whatever the animating principle, the Mayor, by the sweat of his brain, turned out a pretty good job, exhibiting some little subtlety of mind and some facility in disingenuousness. But to be candid we will state that we prefer the Mayor in his poetic moods. You can see that the brief is not to him a felicitous form of literature. The fact is that Dr. Taylor is at his best when softly prating of the crimson coronals of the lilies of the field, or when with lyric fervor he sings of Orient pearls, goldfinches and nightingales. Long after his brief fades from memory his "Ode To The City Hall Dome" will gladden the hearts of posterity. When the Mayor's imagination is chained to a syllogism he utters himself awkwardly, but when astride of Pegasus, giving rein to the graceful wilfulness of his fancy, in the copious flow of his words there is a rhythmic pulse that soothes the esthetic ear. We would advise the Mayor to stick to the rhythmical life; at any rate, until sure that the prosaic impulse has seized him to some purpose. What's the use of wasting time on a brief designed to convince the people who ride in the Sutter street cars that they should felicitate themselves on being martyrs in a glorious cause? And how absurd when it is impossible to prove that the cause is glorious! The Mayor argues in his brief that the United Railroads Company and not the supervisors should be reprobated for the lamentable situation arising out of the withdrawal of the privilege to operate the Sutter street electric cars between Sansome street and the ferry. For the purpose of this argument he puts himself forward as a reservoir of eternal certitudes, and reaches his conclusions through a series of impeccable deductions. Doubtless the Mayor believes that in his brief he has employed faultless logic. He has fallen into the very common error of confounding logic with the art of sophistical controversy called dialectic. In the logical process there are two parts—the choosing of an assumption and the arguing upon it. Dr. Taylor has not the faculty of sound assumption. In this matter he is strictly dialectical. In other words he is a special pleader in the interest of his Administration, and so far as the public is concerned he has been guilty of a perversion of diligence, for who but a fool would expect to get at the merits of a case by listening to the hired advocate or the enthusiast who imagines himself, or affects to be, impartial. The proper way to get at the merits of a case is to have it argued pro and con with vehement bias. Properly to appraise a saint you must hear the devil's advocate. If it were worth while we should give the Hon. E. Robeson Taylor a lesson in dialectic and by demolishing his frail argument teach him that logic is an excellent weapon wherewith to exterminate logicians. But it is sufficient for our purpose to point out that in all this pregnant discussion of a street railroad question the important, paramount fact has been lost sight of, that whether the supervisors grant the desired privilege or not the company will remain master of its monopoly. Consequently the punishment that is being inflicted on the company is on the principle that the proper way to discipline a public service corporation is to prevent it from accommodating the public. To assume that something beneficent is to be achieved by maintaining the present situation is absurd. Mayor Taylor may argue till he is black in the face that the company is wrong and the supervisors right, but it cannot be maintained that the principle involved in that controversy is more important than the public convenience. The law gives the supervisors a certain power over the company, but the law also secures to the company its rights and Pat Calhoun is not to be coerced into surrendering his rights. And, by the way, why should he reduce the value of his property? He is not posing as a reformer or as a philanthropist. He is practicing no such deceptions on the public as have been practiced by some of our patriotic millionaires who acquired valuable properties and public support under pretense of a consuming passion to reduce the burdens of the people. He is frankly making as much money as possible out of his business. Let it be admitted if any satisfaction is to be derived from such admission, that he has taken advantage of a technicality to perfect his hold on a great public franchise through which he enjoys a monopoly. Let it be admitted that he is incorrigible. Let no notice be taken of the fact that what he has he acquired by purchase and that he had no hand in the legislation which made the monopoly possible. But after this agreed statement of facts, what then? How is Pat Calhoun to be out-manoeuvred? Assuredly we may prohibit him from doing all that he wishes to do, but what do we gain? Do we hasten that doubtful blessing—a competing road? Not at all; we cause widespread inconvenience, and with the horse car stimulate fond recollections of the days of yore.

The Repudiation of Spreckels

It is to be hoped that the Hon. Rudolph Spreckels and his pigstye journalists have derived from the results of the primary election an indelible impression of the sentiment of the people of this city and State with respect to their patriotic pretensions. The vote—especially in this city—was distinctly a repudiation of Mr. Spreckels's gumshoe methods in politics as well as of his conduct as the head and front of the nauseous and infamous graft prosecution. It was a luminous manifestation of protest against the behaviour and personality of a man who is believed to be arrogant and vindictive and who appears to have requited the trust and confidence of the people by substituting his own selfish ends for the legitimate ends for which he had been fortified by public sentiment. converting the city government into a personally conducted machine, bringing scandal upon the judiciary, injuring the reputation of San Francisco abroad and plunging the whole community into bitter factional strife. The result of the primary election was heavily charged with humiliation not only for Mr. Spreckels but for all who have been identified with him in his discredited enterprise. There can be no question as to the sentiment expressed at the primary. The issue was clear, and there was no ambiguity in the verdict. For many months the people had been exhorted in impassioned, not to say vulgar language, to avail themselves of the elysian opportunity to be given them by Mr. Spreckels whereby they might throw off the hateful, irritating yoke of the Southern Pacific Company. The Hon. Francis J. Heney, pulpiteering from San Diego to Siskiyou, the veins of his forehead standing out like whipcords, and thumping his brisket to give emphasis to his comminatory utterances, thundered into the ears of the people his prophetic warnings of the terrible fate that would overtake them if they failed to amputate the tentacles of the octopus. In the meantime the pigstye journals were vindicating their devotion to the cause by diffusing slanders designed to smother with obloquy every prominent citizen who would not bend the knee at the throne of the gallant young reformer. Considering all the wealth of rhetoric employed by the exhorters, all the lay and clerical sermons preached to the people, advising them as to the corrupting influence of the Southern Pacific and picturing for them the alluring prospect of the redemption promised by Mr. Spreckels, it would be absurd to venture the hypothesis that the issue had not been clearly apprehended. Everybody intelligent enough to vote knew that a vote against the regulars meant a vote to drive the Southern Pacific out of politics. And everybody knew also, that a vote against the regulars meant a vote of confidence in Rudolph Spreckels and the graft prosecution. And while, unquestionably, the people of this State are far from pleased with railroad domination in politics, the alternative presented to them by the Lincoln-Roosevelt League they would not embrace. The results clearly indicate that Spreckels and his henchmen have overplayed the game of politics. Tuesday's verdict was a ringing rebuke pregnant with galling provocation to poignant rumination. When Mr. Spreckels received news of the result there must have dawned upon his mind like a picture flashed in the darkness a merciless review of the things that he has done and that have been done for him by his bawds of the press and his gumshoe auxiliary. Incidentally it must have occurred to him that it is quite true that all the people are not to be fooled all the time. But now that the verdict has been rendered, will the servants of the people who have been doing the bidding of the gumshoe sanhedrim continue to serve two masters? We hope that the answer to this question will be as clear and distinct as the answer of the people to the exhortations of the humbug reformers. And let us hope also that it will not be long delayed.

The Law's Delays

The ponderous Mr. Taft has been discoursing platitudinously on that old familiar topic, the law's delays. He tells us that justice should be more speedily administered, and also that the poor should be at no disadvantage when litigating with the rich. The evils of which Mr. Taft complains are not of recent origin; nor are they peculiar to present conditions in this country. In other times and in other countries there were successful litigants who had cause to rue the day they sought justice. Long before the Roosevelt epoch; nay, long before Democracy found a home in America, hope deferred that maketh the heart sick, unreasonable expenses, unnecessary appeals and dilatory and evasive proceedings, wore out the means, patience and lives of unfortunate litigants. The time was when everybody appreciated the witticism of the Irish advocate who, when informed from the bench that the remedy of his client was in chancery, exclaimed, "Would your lordship send a fellow-being into chancery?" The quality and character of the administration of justice, the place it should hold in public confidence, the protection it should afford, the influence it should exert, are matters that have occupied the attention of men through many successive generations; and many abuses have been remedied, many reforms instituted, but the system is still far from perfect. In recent years there have been lapses into old, discreditable practices, which have occasioned some injustice. For some of the evils against which there is now complaint, weak and incompetent judges are responsible, for some, the blame may be justly imputed to the legal profession, which, being tinctured with the prevailing vices of a money-mad commercial era has relaxed somewhat in its devotion to precious and ennobling ideals. Some of the evils are not beyond rectification, but as for putting the poor on a plane with the rich that is a consummation which only the socialistic dreamer may speculate upon without rousing suspicion of insincerity. There is a certain inequality that exists in almost all cases of conflict of interest between the rich and poor. But the poor are not disadvantaged in court to the extent the average demagogue would have us believe. The rich man though willing to pay the highest price does not always get the best legal talent. The lawyer with his office in his hat is sometimes a man of greater ability than his high-priced adversary. The most skillfully presented side is not always the one that wins. In short, justice is pretty evenly administered, but unfortunately it is not free.

Roosevelt's Shameful Declaration

Speaking of President Roosevelt's mean innuendo with reference to the United States Court of Appeals on the occasion of the reversal of Judge Landis's absurd decision in the Standard Oil case, Harper's Weekly says, "There has never been known such unanimity in condemnation of a President's utterance," and adds, "In fact, we have not seen or heard a word offered by newspaper or individual in excuse of that official declaration." Nevertheless that remarkable declaration met with newspaper approbation. Here in San Francisco and also in what is known as the maniac colony of Oklahoma there are published newspapers that warmly applauded Mr. Roosevelt's shameful utterance. It is doubtful whether President Roosevelt could say anything which would not meet with the approbation of the vociferous moralists of the local school of journalism. For these moralists are disciples of President Roosevelt. They look to him for encouragement in their self-righteous pretensions and they are continually exchanging felicitations with him in the most approved log-rolling fashion. All bear the same broad phylacteries and point to them with pride. But happily in the country at large Mr. Roosevelt's influence as a moralist has waned. The gospel according to Saint Teddy is no longer accepted as canonical. The protracted obsession has been dispelled. The people who used to maintain stoutly that, whatever the aberrations of Mr. Roosevelt's judgment, his heart was in the right place, now view his conduct with disgust. There has been a popular revulsion against the man whose repeated denials of statements attributed to him by men of intelligence and character have made the Ananias club something of a joke. His audacities having palled on the public which has suffered from his demagogic political machinations, his hold on the popular imagination having relaxed, and the people having emerged from their trance, they are able now to make an accurate estimate of the man who lied and wriggled out of the Bellamy Storror scandal and the cunning politican who threw out deceitful bait to Harriman, and after spending the latter's money to purchase floaters and repeaters in New York, held him up to the execration of the rabble. Many of the erstwhile worshipers of Mr. Roosevelt are not even at present claiming for his conduct that it arose from mistaken motives of right. Nothing has more clearly exemplified the change of sentiment toward Mr. Roosevelt than the reception accorded his disgraceful utterance on the subject of the decision reversing Judge Landis. And now, in all the circumstances we are disposed like Harper's Weekly "to regard it philosophically as justifying completely the criticisms which we have passed upon Mr. Roosevelt's methods during the past two years, and for which, from time to time, we have been taken somewhat severely to task."

Press Criticism

While Harper's Weekly is somewhat severe in its strictures on President Roosevelt it is not quite so frank in accounting for his misconduct in office or so bold in its interpretation of his motives as some of the other leading journals of the country. The Weekly is content with felicitating the people on the fact that Mr. Roosevelt's term of office expires in March. Some newspapers that have thundered censure and objurgation into his ear tell us that on all sides men have been bowed down with shame by the hysterical ravings of the country's Chief Magistrate. The New York Post has reviewed his career to prove that he is a politican utterly without sincerity. The New York Sun says:

"We do not think that Mr. Roosevelt's character qualifies him to criticise the courts in any way. We do not think that the public is in the mood, especially the public in this State, to listen with patience to abuse of the courts by corrupt and dishonest politicians. In the campaign of 1904 Mr. Roosevelt obtained a quarter of a million dollars from corporations represented by Mr. E. H. Harriman, for the purpose of corrupting the voters in this his own State. There never was a grosser instance of political corruption in our history. It is pleaded in extenuation of Mr. Roosevelt's act that he never meant to carry out his part of the bargain whereby he got the money. He is welcome to the full force and effect of that plea in mitigation. We believe unreservedly in criticism of the courts. That such criticism is natural and wholesome no sensible man ever disputed. But it must come from men who have clean hands. Mr. Roosevelt is not a fit person to pass judgment upon the law's administration. Mr. Roosevelt will do well to reflect that his circumstances are changed and that however blind and deaf to his many derelictions the public may have been heretofore, it is now wide awake and keenly sensitive to matters that touch upon its own honor. Granting without hesitation that it is true that Mr. Roosevelt has aroused public sentiment in respect to integrity in affairs and that he has quickened the public conscience in regard to civic morals, he is grievously mistaken if he infers that in doing so he has established any right to immunity for himself. So great is the present lucidity of the public mind that it is apparent that had Mr. Roosevelt been nominated at Chicago his election would have presently been seen to be hopless. Far more hopeless than the election of Mr. Bryan now appears to dispassionate and competent observers."

There is not much that is equivocal in the foregoing. Viewed as a rebuke rather than as a formal arraignment it is lacking neither in vigor nor in force. Nor is it the language of a perfervid partisan holding up to obloquy a candidate for office. For the present, as a political factor President Roosevelt is eliminated from consideration. The Sun can have no sinister motive in thus disparaging the Chief Magistrate of the county, in affirming virtually that the man holding the highest office in the gift of the American people is unworthy of the respect of men. No sane, decent citizen would hurl such imputations and accusations at the President of the United States were they without foundation of the most substantial character.

Perspective Impressions

Very often love is a disposition woman experiences for the man she—cannot marry.

It is not always what a woman does but what she may do that makes her interesting.

Apparently a knock for Herrin is not a boost for "Spreck."

By the way—wasn't the verdict loud enough to produce an echo at that high attitude where the ravings of a degenerate of the bench are now under consideration?

Mr. Samuel Gompers says he has no politics. Which is another way of saying that he is a man with elastic principles. Hence the feeling of kinship between Gompers and Bryan.

Perhaps the people were not unmindful of the allowance of $800 out of the treasury for the Burns family. And perhaps they will not forget the supervisors who voted for it.

One of the unpleasant phenomena of the times is the success that attends the journalism that is devoted principally to the propagation of envy.

From an editorial in the New York Sun of August 1st: "In the first place the recent struggle over the governorship between Kitchen and Craig has left many open sores behind." Somebody must have been spanked.

Do the people who pay the salaries of the notoriety-seekers of the pulpit care to hear any more sermons that are preached at the request of the bawds of journalism and upon promise to give space to the right kind of stuff?

"San Francisco," says the Chronicle, "ought to have an elegant and commodious station near the heart of the city, but it will not be provided so long as those who run our railways are wholly engrossed with the desire to get all they can out of the community without giving anything back." Will Mr. De Young guarantee the acquiescence of our corporation-baiters in a proposition to grant our railways a right of way to the heart of the city?

The Other Woman

By Paul Oscar Hocker

He had come to the Riviera, where he wanted to forget the sickness of his heart in the midst of the exuberant gaities of the carnival season, with its masked balls and flower parades. However, his itinerary had been planned in disregard of the calendar. He established himself in one of the small French hotels which lie scattered over the lower beach at Condamine. Of course, he visited the Casino on the very first evening, where he played and won, and then lost what he had just gained. The play did not serve to excite him in the least, and he was rather irritated at his own indifference. His artistic eye was pleased with the brilliant spectacle unrolled before him at the theatre or on the terrace of the Cafe de Paris. Still he did not feel light-hearted and happy. Somehow, he could not make himself care for pleasure at the present time. His recent experience had been too much for him. Often and often though he told himself that the short farewell letter he had received from Her must be the end of all things between them, yet his thoughts could not leave her, and her image was invariably present to his mind. When in a softer mood, he would yield to his longing; then again his will power would triumph.

What he needed was work, effort, activity, instead of play and pleasure. He now planned and worked on a drama, impersonating the living memories of his love, which filled his mind to the exclusion of all other things. These were days of delight for him, although or because his task exacted strenuous efforts before the individual figures would assume distinct shape. Nothing but his drama existed for him at this period. His correspondence was entirely neglected, and when one day a certain note reached him, after circuitous journeys, he did not recall the writer at the first lines, and even afterwards he tried in vain to reconstruct her portrait from memory.

The lady's letter had been penned on board an excursion steamer, while she was enjoying a thirty days' trip on the Mediterranean. She had much to say on the subject of Monte Carlo, the paradise of flowers and of Paris model hats, which was attracting her. His answer was short and terse, with thinly veiled sarcasms. Then there came a picture postal from Corfu, in which she told him that she would probably come after all to spend a couple of weeks in "lovely and wicked" Monte Carlo, as she called it. Up to this hour, he had still hoped secretly, almost stealthily, for a sign of life from the other woman. Now this postal card awakened all his old fiery resentment. Day in and day out he had pondered over the past, but at last he was forced in bitter disappointment before the question: Did she care for him at all? Did he still mean anything at all for her feelings and her life?

"Dear doctor, have the kindness to engage pleasant quarters for me in Upper Monte Carlo," next wrote the temptress from Naples, on a picture postal ornamented with Mount Vesuvius. "I understand that everything is overcrowded out there, and my relatives, who usually relieve me of similar worries, have unfortunately decided to remain on board the steamer. Or had I better return with them to Berlin direct? What do you say?"

He held the postal undecidedly in his hand. Mount Vesuvius was laboring with uncanny efforts upon the gaudy cardboard. The wealth of colors flooding the southern landscape had a somewhat artificial effect. He smiled at the idea that this visit should appear to him in the light of an indefinable danger in regard to the other woman. "This person is no volcano," he assured himself, "and the color of her passion is borrowed from the rouge pot."

Within the hour he rode to Monte Carlo and at the hotel transacted the courier duties assigned him by the lady. He did so with a beating heart, however, and had to admit to himself that he felt rather foolish about changing his own domicile.

All work had to be discarded for the present. From the moment that she had moved into her expensive and charmingly furnished apartment, rest and concentration were no longer possible for him. The lady took sweet revenge upon him for his indifference, doing her level best to render him enamored and jealous.

"She really is deucedly pretty!" he said to himself, when they sat down vis-a-vis at the table d'hote. She was past mistress of the arts of the toilette. Whenever he set eyes on her, he had another opportunity of admiring her in a new masterpiece of the dressmaker's art. Neither did he remain her sole admiring cavalier. She met various friends during her very first promenade along the wide terraced park of the Palace Hotel. These were harnessed at once to her triumphal chariot, and the small table at which she presided was the merriest one of the entire hotel.

That same afternoon she left them all to attend an opera party in Nice. Shortly after eleven o'clock in the evening he strolled in the direction of the Casino. When he reached the station, the crowded cars were just rolling in. The lady emerged in person, for she had not been to the opera after all, but had gone shopping instead with an acquaintance, who knew all about Nice. She had acquired a treasure trove of silk and laces and fripperies.

"And then I got me a frock, a Paris model—simply a dream!" she said beamingly, just as excited over the fact as a girl in her 'teens. "It fits like a glove! I shall have it by tomorrow afternoon. Then I shall wear it for dinner in the evening. By the by, were you going to the Casino at this time of night?"

"Yes, that was my intention."

She playfully threatened him. "I would never have forgiven you. This very evening, I had meant to put your devotion to the test."

"Indeed!"

"Now you must turn back with me at once, do you hear?"

"But then you must promise to have a glass of champagne with me on the terrace."

"Impossible. I am ready to drop. Imagine how I have trudged for hours, from one department store to the other, in the Nice sunshine! But I will promise for tomorrow. Only you will have to be very, very nice indeed!"

"I thought I was always nice."

"By no means. There is room for improvement!"

She laughed and coquettishly dropped her head a little to one side. "Moreover, tomorrow is my birthday."

"And you did not tell me before? Of course, we will have to celebrate."

"I really did not mean to celebrate at all. Standing all alone as I do—and having passed through so many experiences—but then I always tell myself: Youth is so short and so fleeting," she remarked, with somewhat affected sentimentality.

She took his proffered arm and turned at his side into the path leading to the hotel. The terrace was illuminated in fairy-like splendor. Dark figures in dress suits appeared like shadows at the side of daintily gowned and diamond-bedecked women. The Gypsy music, the tinkling laughter, the fragrance of flowers, and the rustle of silk blended into a festive, intoxicating essence of pleasure in the semi-tropical, sultry, starlit night.

Under the seal of secrecy, the entire circle of acquaintances had been informed about the impending birth-

The Great American Cocktail

By Major Ben C. Truman

Not so gorgeous nor so queenly as the julep; not so ambrosial nor so imposing as the punch; not so satisfying nor so domesticating as the nogg; not so rejuvenating nor so evanescent as the fizz; but more soothing, more exhilarating, more bracing, more enticing and more dangerous than all others, is the American Cocktail, the ne plus ultra of compounded potables, and indulged in at present more largely than all other made drinks.

When Esculapius confidently asserted in the presence of his disciples that there was somewhere in the world an efficacious remedy for every pain, he spoke with greater wisdom than he knew. He did not dream even of a western hemisphere, much less of its most famous and seductive drink.

It may never be known who invented the cocktail, or where it originated. Boston and New York lay claims to the honor, and the preference is awarded the latter city, since it is known that old Peter Stuyvesant put a few drops of bitters and a bit of sugar into his glass of Holland gin, thus making the first gin cocktail, and pronounced the mixture a success; and that his friends came to him from miles away, smacked their lips over the agreeable beverage and went home full of joy and recipes for making the seductive anteprandial "nip."

To be sure, Virginia, some fifty years ago, put in its claim, as usual, of genealogy, and essayed the following exquisite fiction, which is as visionary as it is clever.

It is to a certain Col. Carter, not of Cartersville, but of Culpepper Courthouse, Va., that belongs the honor of inventing the cocktail, and this is how it all happened: Near Culpepper Courthouse there used to stand an old inn, built to imitate the famous roadhouses of England and bearing the storied sign of "Cock and Bottle." The former word in the old vernacular stood for the tap. The point is that the man who got the last drink and the muddy portion of the tap was said to have received the "cocktail." Col. Carter was once subjected to this indignity and threw the stuff upon the floor. "Heahaftah," he said, "I'll drink cocktails of ma own decoction, sah." And starting to "clean out the shop," he dashed together bitters, sugar, bits of lemon peel and Holland gin. Great oaks from little acorns grow, and this was the genesis of the cocktail—so have been seriously said by some clever writer.

But we need not quarrel over the parentage of this famous bracer-up. Suffice it to say that it came to stay, and may now be found not only in the country of its birth but in every part of the civilized globe. And while it is neither so reputable nor so alluring as the julep or the punch, it is no less as artistic production; and, when its ingredients have been harmoniously assimilated, like a dainty mosaic alongside a brilliant creation in oil it elicits admiration and appreciation. Let us enter the "study" of an artist and see him prepare elixirs for two:

First, he sets out a mixing goblet of prismatic crystal, and with the dexterous hand that only waits on years of patient study deftly decants and gauges a portion of liquor, a dilicious blend, one-half French vermouth, one-half the sun-kissed product of the laughing corn; then half a goblet of cracked ice; then a few clever and well-timed bits of jugglery to and fro; then a dash from one, two, three mysterious bottles, absinthe in one, the gum of rock candy in another, orange bitters in a third; then a brief yet scientific vibration of the crystal goblet, the bits of ice whispering to each other in a soft, delicious language that touches a tender and responsive chord in the hearts (let us not say vitals) of the waiting gentlemen; then, last stroke of all, there is a flash of a silver strainer and the deft whirl of a silver spoon; a twinkling more, and a bit of lemon yields a kiss of pungent oil, sprayed with the cunning of an old coquette—presto!

The earliest cocktails were made of gin (straight); then gin and brandy divided the honors as liquors; then whisky came to be generally preferred to either; and at present, brandy is seldom used. But vermouth and maraschino and often a drop or two of absinthe are now introduced, and the result is the Manhattan or Martini as a perfect symphony of the mixer's art.

That more danger lurks in the cocktail than any other compounded drink is a matter of absolute fact. Like the coquette, it is tempting and often dangerous. It is just as safe as any other drink made of liquor for a moderate drinker in perfect condition, and especially in the evening—just before dinner, say after a good day's mental work. But if it be required!—in the morning, say—to soothe a head, it is sometimes a villain beside which Iago and Mephistopheles are honest fellows.

Oh! isn't it agreeable—isn't it soothing—isn't it good? Yes; for awhile. But under such circumstances, it is a demon right from the first, and invariably exacts its pound of flesh, so to speak. Just you dally with it when you ought not, and you'll surely see! It seems an angel, but it has hoofs instead of wings.

The late Dr. Willard Parker, the elder, used to say of this great American drink, that cocktails instead of being a stimulant are an irritant; they are like a whip and spur to a horse instead of like oats. "Cocktails," said he, "are essentially bad. They not only contain liquor in a concentrated form, but the bitters in them are apt to have properties that are irritating rather than stimulating. A very bad point about cocktails is that they are apt to be drunk hastily and on an empty stomach. Spirits should always be well diluted, slowly imbibed, and taken with food, or after eating. Alcohol temporarily stops the action of the gastric juice and irritates the coating of the stomach in such a way as to simulate hunger, but not by the production of a true appetite. It is a false appetite and not a healthy one that is thus brought about meantime, and the digestion is retarded. The steady cocktail drinker is very apt to become a victim of catarrh of the stomach, and, like all steady tipplers, soon finds his liver more or less affected."

There is very much truth in what Dr. Parker says. Still, the cocktail becomes more and more popular, among both men and women, with each day's revolution of our planet around the sun, and the cocktail routes become as numerous as the stars in the Milky Way. And so long as men obtain aching heads at night and sluggish stomachs by day, so long will they seek that smiling necromancer whose magic manipulation is as gentle and artistic as that of a limner restoring a picture by an old master; while there are those who as habitually press the button at home or hotel as they dress daily for their matutinal repast. Other cocktail devotees never start upon a journey without carrying with them a flask of this recuperating fluid, although the drink may be obtained at almost any railway station restaurant. Sporting men and boxers are particularly prone to this weakness, and more than one man felled ostensibly by a soft glove, has been in reality knocked out from having too frequently flirted with a Martini surreptitiously tucked away in a hip-pocket flask.

Rudolph's Musings

The musings of the Hon. Rudolph Spreckels on Tuesday last have been translated into verse for his own particular edification:

I am a King today,
But what of tomorrow?
Let it be as it may,
I am a King today;
Yet who knows but my way
Leads to sadness and sorrow.
I am a King today,
But what of tomorrow.

The Dimmick Case

Some of President Wheeler's warmest admirers were filled with grief last week when they read in the papers that he had petitioned his friend Mr. Roosevelt to pardon Walter Dimmick, convicted of larceny, and now approaching the wind-up of his term in the penitentiary. According to President Wheeler there is grave doubt of Dimmick's guilt. Unquestionably Dimmick's guilt was not established to the satisfaction of everybody, but it was established by Detective William J. Burns, a gentleman whose sponsors enjoy the esteem and confidence of the Berkeley philosopher. Detective Burns worked up the case against Dimmick. And now to question the guilt of the prisoner is indirectly to reflect discredit on Detective Burns. For no man is so well qualified to judge of the guilt of an accused person as the detective by whom all the evidence is gathered. Detective Burns, as we know, does not employ the most approved methods in procuring convictions. His methods are not the methods best adapted for ascertaining the truth. Whether he was so zealous in the Dimmick case as he has been in other cases, I do not know, but I quite agree with President Wheeler that there is grave doubt of the prisoner's guilt. Dimmick was charged with having stolen many thousands of dollars from the Mint, but he had no money to use in his own defense and his wife and children have been in great poverty and distress ever since his arrest. There are many who say that the man who stole the money was not arrested.

An Episode of the Jinks

Even in so imponderable a thing as the atmosphere of the Midsummer Jinks of the Bohemian Club the whirligig of time effects wondrous transformations. A year ago so active were certain eminent darlings of the elect in contributing to the gaiety of the occasion that the atmosphere was redolent of civic patriotism and conscious righteousness. The Hon. Francis J. Heney was in the very midst of things. The Hon. E. Robeson Taylor was bottled effervescence in continuous process of being uncorked and he was programmed for a speech, which he made. And all the while the higher-ups modestly figured in the soft gloaming of the background. It was different this year. Mr. Heney haunted by an interrogation point was not on parade. His Chestiness was nowhere in evidence. He failed to put in an appearance. Jimmy Phelan was there, but inaudible. All the noise that was in him he must have expended at the Peninsula Hotel. The Hon. E. Robeson Taylor was conspicuous, but only by reason of his whiskers. The effervescence was gone. He was not called upon to give utterance to himself. The irreverent alluded to him as "Fuzzy-Wuzzy." The Hon. Rudolph Spreckels who made himself illustrious and won for himself a chapter in the unwritten annals of the club by his method of getting in failed to impart grace and tone to the jinks. He was probably busy doing politics in town. As for the higher-ups—Pat. Calhoun, Tirey L. Ford, John Martin and Eugene de Sabla—they were the life of the party. One of the interesting episodes of the outing occurred at the dinner given by the Star and Garter annex, a little coterie of congenial spirits, prominent among whom are Mr. Martin and Mr. de Sabla. In the midst of their prandial festivities, just as John Martin was doing a carving stunt, the Hon. William P. Lawlor, judge of one of our Superior Courts, injected himself into the proceedings. Taking a chair he made himself at home. This proof of the judge's capacity for adapting himself to circumstances, however great the incongruity to be overcome, was commented on by his warmest admirers.

Another Episode

Another episode of the Jinks more or less indicative of the atmosphere occurred at the dinner on Saturday night. The central figure of this episode was the Hon. Frank Dunne, famous for his catch-as-catch-can bouts with the rudimentaries of the law. This distinguished judicial officer, far from the bulwarks of the bench, with no adventitious or supervenient circumstances to lift him above the general, presented an appearance not less rueful than that of Rozinante's rider. Apparently he was not in touch with the spirit of the occasion. In the heart of a merry, rollicking throng he was as isolated and lonely as a sole survivor on a desolate island. Presently this pathetic figure caught the eyes of a little group of good fellows and some one remarked that the Judge seemed to symbolize evil tidings at a wedding breakfast. One there was in the group who took pity on him, and to rouse him from his dejected state and indicate to him the avenue to mirth and pleasantry addressed him in a glad, inviting tone. Startled out of his comber musings the Judge sat up, took notice, smiled and extended his hand to him by whom he had been addressed. Thereafter he seemed to extract a little joy from the festivities. The man by whom the Judge had been addressed and to whom he extended his hand was Tirey L. Ford.

"The Only Way" at the Jinks

One of the best cartoons at the Bohemian Jinks dealt with the recent Hotaling-Miller episode. It portrayed Dick Hotaling seated on a high stool scowling with a threatening melodramatic thunder-look at Henry Miller who was seated on a high stool opposite returning the menacing glare. Each had a murderous looking pistol in hand, while loaded blunderbusses leaned beside them. In the middleground reposed a money bag marked "$14" and above it stretched a huge sign on which was chalked in bold relief "The Only Way."

The Joke on Joe Campbell

Of the many practical jokes played the one on Joe Campbell was more appreciated by the skylarking throng than by the victim himself. Seated at a table and apparently deeply immersed in a game of dominoes were Willis Polk and a friend. Along came innocent, genial Joe Campbell, serene, smiling and kindly disposed towards the whole wide world. "Want to score for us, Joe," asked Polk, abstractedly, as he continued deep in his game. Campbell did: he wanted to help everybody on such a joyous occasion. "There's the scorer's chair," said Willis, indicating a near by seat. Campbell dropped into it and—the next instant shot six feet into the air propelled by a bolt of electricity. The chair was loaded. While still clutching the yielding atmosphere and while pain, surprise, reproof and anger wildly struggled for expression on his gentle face a throng of delighted apaches burst whooping from the surrounding tents and green woods and a stentor with a big megaphone roared "Stung!" Of course the drinks were on Campbell and of course Campbell being such a whole souled, thoroughly all round good fellow and fully appreciating the situation every apache called for a twenty-five cent installment. While he was eyeing the increasing line as it struggled towards the bar a mad wag had the temerity to ask him if he was wishing that he had kept going while still in the air.

Loaded Dice for the Unwary

The loaded dice at the bar caught many unwary Bohemians with a known predilection to side-step their treat. Such cases were handled by an artful and crafty self-appointed committee. The lynx-eyed artist handling the megaphone always shouted "stung" while the victim was struggling in the trap and of course a swarm of delighted revelers immediately sprung from all sides to laugh at his discomfiture and to add to the score against him by joining those at the tankards.

Death of a Noble Woman

The rather sudden death of Miss Annie Dargie in Oakland last Monday was a great shock to her many friends and filled many hearts with sadness. Annie Dargie was of a rare and most admirable type of womanhood. She had the golden faculty of inspiring warm and lasting friendships, and fortunate indeed were those to whom she paid the tribute of her esteem; for in her loyalty and self-sacrificing devotion to friends she rose to sublime heights. A woman of the most generous and charitable impulses, after the great April disaster when people fled to Oakland for succor and safety, most active among those by whom the refugees were received was Annie Dargie, and she was untiring in her kindly ministrations and her efforts to relieve distress. And now, all that know of the ideal relations that existed between Mr. W. E. Dargie and his sister, of her gentle influence and her loving vigilance in respect of his interests, must feel for him in his bereavement the profoundest, sincerest sympathy.

The Sarcastic Longpre

Mr. Paul de Longpre, a gentleman who practices the minor and rather prosaic art of painting flowers, has written me a letter rebuking me for saying that in censuring the Congress of the United States for its indifference to art he was neither accurate nor just. This is the severe language of his reproval: "Out of over eighty editorials yours is the only one criticising the project, and after all I like it; it makes a little change over the unanimous approval coming from every other State without exception." Apparently Mr. de Longpre is sarcastic as well as artistic. It will probably surprise Mr. de Longpre, the flower painter, to learn that if I some matter of art I should be inclined to accept as consome matter of art I should be inclined to accept as confirmation the dissent of seventy-nine editors of the calibre of those quoted by him in the circular letter which he is now distributing. But Mr. de Longpre has entirely misconstrued my criticism. I am not opposed to his pet project. I have not the slightest objection to a national art gallery or a national school of painting. Such institutions can do no harm. They might do much good. Almost everybody realizes the political functions of letters and the arts and their immense importance in connection with the prosperity of a commercial nation, but that "national art institutions," as Mr. de Longpre says in his circular letter to the press, "would surely place the United States in the front rank with her composers, painters, sculptors and her dramatic artists," is an assertion in which I must decline to concur. The arts are not founded on facts which are evolved. Art is not to be achieved by study. It is the instinctive and inevitable result of powers which can be developed only through successive generations and which reach their efflorescence under propitious social conditions.

Factories Better Than Academies

When I discussed Mr. de Longpre's scheme a few weeks ago it was for the purpose of suggesting the advisability of laying the foundation of the disposition essential to the growth and development of a national art movement. He is under the misapprehension that an artistic feeling can be diffused through a people by means of a school in which artists are trained; that a popular relish for art can be created by an academy in which men are taught to draw; that all the people are to be refined and edified by a national art gallery. Now as I have tried to point out, before a national taste for art can be created the people must be educated up to a love of the beautiful; and to that end there must be a widespread cultivation of the artistic instinct. How is this to be achieved? By familiarizing the people with that body of art which deals with the objects of every-day life, the art in which is comprised the crafts of furniture-making, carpentry, pottery, book-binding, weaving and embroidery. Art is never more effectively employed than in its application to objects which are in common use and hence immediately presented to the eyes of those who most need to profit by its refining influence. When the Academy of Painters and Sculpture and the School of Architecture were called into being in France, it was not particularly to teach painters and sculptors and architects. Glassmakers were brought from Venice and lacemakers from Flanders that they might yield to France the secret of their skill. The principal object of the royal collections of art was to educate public taste and increase the knowledge of the working classes. The elaborate factories of the Savonnerie and the Gobelins were better schools than the academies, for in them were cultivated the instinct and the disposition which gave the artistic impulse to the French people. In other words before the French people acquired the artistic feeling there was a popular art in that country, and the plain people knew something of form and beauty, a knowledge that came to them while working in the decorative arts. If Mr. de Longpre will include in his scheme a plan for the cultivation of popular taste for the decorative arts he will have my hearty endorsement. Without such a plan I shall not have much faith in his propaganda.

The Cordial Reception of Harriman

The amiable treatment which Mr. E. H. Harriman received from all the dailies when he came to town last week was not at all what might have been expected in view of the assaults that have been made upon him at long range. Mr. Harriman, it has been said, is one of the most loathsome creatures now cumbering this earth. We have been told that he is the most malign of the organized enemies of the people; that he is the source and fountain-head of all the corruption that menaces the integrity of our institutions; in short, that of all the abominations by which we are beset he is absolutely the worst. Not many months ago we were promised the head of Mr. Harriman on a charger. It was to have been struck off by Mr. Heney with his grand jury hatchet. Mr. Harriman was to pay the penalty of his crimes. But after the deepest and most thorough scrutiny Mr. Heney, to his profound chagrin and disappointment, was unable to discover that Mr. Harriman had committed any crime. It was in the case of Mr. Harriman that Mr. Heney first made it clear to us that the burden of his vociferations is not always to be taken seriously. But this illuminating revelation caused no change in the attitude of Mr. Heney's journalistic sponsors toward the railroad magnate. They went on berating him with undiminished enthusiasm. It was not until Mr. Harriman came to town that our delirious journals abated their fury. Then instead of hurling epithets at his head they prodded him with questions, inquired into his views on divers subjects of general interest, and sifted his ideas with great diligence. Mr. Harriman was presented to us through the medium of these journals not in the familiar role of monster, but as a great captain of industry to whom we should be grateful for his achievements as an empire builder. The reaction against muckraking which recently caused a change in the policy of the yellow magazines is now felt in San Francisco.

Wheeler's Devotion to Harriman

It was not recorded in the dailies that the Hon. Benjamin Ide Wheeler paid his respects to Mr. Harriman at the Fairmont, but it would surprise me very much to learn that our distinguished Berkeley scholar neglected an opportunity to give the great financier renewed assurance of the steadfastness of his esteem. While Mr. Wheeler's passions and prejudices are in a measure amenable and responsive to White House sentiment, whatever is in Presidential disfavor is not necessarily frowned upon by the philologist of the State University. It pleases the Hon. Benjamin Ide Wheeler to be one of Mr. Roosevelt's ardent disciples; to pay Mr. Roosevelt's policies the tribute of his endorsement; to signalize his concurrence in Mr. Roosevelt's heterodox and even anarchic utterances, but that is as far as he will go in his fealty to Omnipotence. His friendly relations with Mr. Harriman are not to be disrupted merely because that gentleman is a member of the Ananias Club in good and high standing. For Mr. Harriman he has great admiration. This sentiment he exhibited in a most striking manner at the Bohemian Midsummer Jinks about two years ago, when he engaged Mr. Harriman's attentions almost incessantly, and performed the very kindest offices for that gentleman. Early one morning in the grove, a member of the club sitting in front of his tent, was suddenly startled by the breaking of twigs in the tangled wildwood hard by. His first impression was that some wild animal was approaching, but in another moment a man appeared and looked about as if in quest of something. His eyes falling on a coat that had been left upon a rustic table, he seized it, and saying to the gentleman in front of the tent, "Oh, I just came for Mr. Harriman's coat," departed as abruptly as he had come. The coat-bearer was President Benjamin Ide Wheeler.

A Harriman Story

When engaged in inspecting his railroad systems Mr. Harriman never loses an opportunity to impress the chiefs of departments with the importance of keeping an eye open for the small non-essentials. By way of illustration he recently told a story of the experience of a keen business man who bought a cheap theatre which had long been unprofitable. By economical management he put it immediately on a paying basis. But he did not relax his vigilance, and when the first month's bill of expenses was rendered he found the item: "Meat for cats—to protect the scenery and properties from the ravages of rats—$2." The item was struck out and on the margin was penciled the note: "If the cats eat the rats, wherefore the meat? If they don't, wherefore the cats?"

She—You said you'd never love another if I did not marry you.
He—Yes, but you did marry me.

native of San Francisco. He is to be sent to Germany, there to blossom and diffuse his fragrance on the cultured air. But let us consider The Early Pea and The Late Pea:

Once in a Field, where Peas were grown,
Two Species side by side lay sown—
The One was of the Early Kind,
To bear a forward Crop designed;
The Other, late; not timed to sprout
Until uncertain April's out.
Now March, that Year—the Month reviled—
Belied its Fame with Weather mild,
So when the Early Pea broke through
And saw, above, the genial Blue,
Kissed by the Sun's soft Warmth and Light,
She cried: "What ho! This 'is' all right!"
And, pitying, she deplored the Fate
Unkind of her more backward Mate,
Who buried still in Torpor lay
Beneath the Surface of the Clay.
"By Peasticks! How I pity you,
Thus hid from Sun and Welkin blue,
While I enjoy this Weather fair
And revel in the Upper Air."
The other Pea—the backard Sort—
Just answered with a drowsy Snort:
"Be careful how too soon you revel,
For April's oft the very Devil!"
Came April in. 'Twas warm at first,
And all the Trees began to burst.
But soon things took another Tack,
Belated Winter Frosts came back
And turned the forward Green-stuff black.
Thus Early Pea, erstwhile so gay,
Now parched and withered Litter lay;
While, safe from Frost's Destruction kept,
Her Friend in Earth's warm Bosom slept,
Murmuring: "Ah, me! what risks they run,
Who court too soon the fickle Sun.
Better to face a longer Gloom,
Secure in Earth's protecting Womb,
Nor germinate in early Days,
While faithless still the Weather's Ways,
Than, springing up too quick and bold,
Succumb untimely to the Cold!"

Professor Herrick's Novel

The tempest raging in feminine club circles over Professor Robert Herrick's novel, "Together," and the attitude assumed by the fair dames toward it causes one to wonder whether they have read the book or, if they have, whether they have the gray matter requisite for comprehension of what Professor Herrick has striven to set forth. What the author says and emphasizes is that the tendency of marriage today, amongst those who regard themselves as of "the better classes," is wrong. The home, in the old sense, is rapidly disappearing and the fault is chiefly that of the wives, who are in no sense the partners of the men they marry. They do not, as in pioneer times, work side by side with their husbands. It is no longer necessary that they should assist in the primitive occupations of clearing land and planting crops, but they do not even husband and administer the store. The successful man, according to Professor Herrick, is he who can sell himself for the highest sum and lay the price at the lady's feet. She is pleased accordingly, and as a reward, spurs him to further activities in the same direction. She wants to "entertain," and it is up to him to find the wherewithal, else he is said to be cruel and neglectful. She wants a town house and a country place and a suite of apartments at her disposal in some fashionable hotel, and she wants, wants, wants, everlastingly and eternally. Meanwhile she will not willingly bear or nourish children and when a child happens to be born she turns it over to a trained nurse and puts herself into the hands of some fashionable specialist. She has a "soul" and she needs to "develop" and so on. In plain English, the wife of a successful millionaire is nine times out of ten just a "thing," useless, selfish and egotistic.

The Lesson in His Story

Well, isn't it all true enough? Hasn't the rich American wife become a by-word in Europe, where she trails around from court to capital, and from bath to spa, generally unattached? Isn't the prevalence of divorce and re-marriage just for the sake of novelty and change a matter of course? The good ladies who have flown to the defense of their maligned sex give but another illustration of their inability to stick to the point under discussion. Some of them generously admit that Professor Herrick speaks truly of "a certain class." That is all he attempted to do. Others dismiss the matter with a hazard that he must be "young," "unmarried," "jilted" and so, of course, incapable of distinguishing dark from daylight, and nearly every one of them assumes that "Together" is but another presentation of the woman who enters into marriage solely for the sake of material gain, whereas there is not one solitary example of an out-and-out mercenary marriage cited in the whole five hundred pages of the novel. It simply sets forth the plain facts that no marriage, of rich or poor, can be a success when husband and wife do not pull together in a common cause; that wealth will not save nor poverty wreck, and that what the average woman needs to keep her clean and wholesome is less idle time in which to indulge her egotism, more work for head and hands, and vastly less nonsense preached to her from all sources on the subject of her superiority to the uses for which she was designed. "Together" happens to be the kind of book which cannot be adequately skimmed in the fifteen minutes before dinner is announced. Neither Carolyn Wells' "Bookshop Girl" nor Charles Battell Loomis' "Bookish Bootblack" could have disposed of it in two clever sentences, and neither will the first and last chapter and a few passages culled here and there answer the purpose. If the ladies of clubland really desire to do themselves and the author justice there is only one way—furnish themselves with a copy of "Together" and sit down and read it.

Ruef in the Forty-Fifth

During Tuesday's primary a group of old time ward politicians happened to foregather in one of the precincts of the forty-fifth assembly district, Ruef's old stamping ground, and in passing the time lamented on the general quietness of the day in contrast with the good old Kilkenney, money scattering times when the results of an election depended on the size of the barrels and the dare deviltry of the opposing forces. They recounted some of the wily work in the Burns campaigns and told of the fine stratagems of "Doc" Meyers in holding the forty-fifth. "Doc" preceded Ruef as boss of that district. Ruef was rated by these old timers as a fair politician, an indefatigable worker and a good spender, when money would furnish him favorable results. In the early days Abe was beaten time and again by his shifty opponents; as one of them put it, they "buried him" every time he came to life. But Abe proved a lively corpse and had a fund of craftiness even in those days. He never neglected to properly "salt" the County Committee and no matter how badly he was beaten in the primaries in nearly every instance he finally managed to out-flank his enemies by taking an appeal to the County Committee and getting a decision in his favor. Those were the days of reckless frauds in voting. One of the narrators, for instance, told how he reached his polling booth early one morning so as to save his vote. He was the third man in line yet he found the box so crammed with tickets that the inspector was unable to force in his ballot. Free fights were common among the rival factions and an election day in the district that did not furnish a dozen cracked sconces and a score of arrests was accounted a tame affair.

A Record Barrel Campaign

According to the memory of a gray beard politician present one of the biggest barrels ever broached in a political campaign on the coast was opened on the occasion when Fair started his race for the U. S. Senate. Nevada was the storm centre of gold dust and reckless political fights in those days. How much Fair spent will never be known but it is said by many old timers that merely to make a showing in the same race cost Adolph Sutro $200,000. When this fight was hottest along the Comstock lode votes brought $80 each. Fair had just made a big clean up on the lode and he backed the demands of his lieutenants for coin so steadfastly that when the Legislature met it looked as if his fight was won. At this stage of the game Sutro suddenly awoke with the ambition that he too wanted to go to Washington to serve the nation. Fair's cinch on the situation, the lateness of the hour to enter the contest, the immense cost of a fight and other obstacles were explained to Sutro but they all seemed easy hurdles to the man who had just cleaned up a great fortune with the world against him. He asked how much the fight would cost. The figure was placed at $200,000. By the next day he had that amount in cash delivered by the express company in Carson and the fight was on. Fair and his lieutenants were startled for a time for Sutro was known to be a hard fighter and a stayer. Both sides buckled down to fine work. Sutro had able lieutenants and their first attack was to win away legislative members from the Fair caucus. Money was scattered judiciously and many of Fair's supporters followed it into the outlying sagebrush, to San Francisco, and other places where they became "lost" when wanted. At last things reached a pass where it looked as though Sutro might win. A number of those who had "flopped" wanted an excuse to offer in the Legislature for their change of base. To balm their conscience a scheme was arranged by Sutro's lieutenants whereby Lew Drexler, one of Fair's chief distributors and a member of the Legislature, should be arrested for offering bribes. No matter whether the charge stuck or not one of the Sutro representatives was to rise in the Legislature and denounce Fair and his followers as base corruptors of the State's political manhood. A speaker was put in training to rip Fair and his alleged methods to pieces and in the wake of his phillipic the "floppers" were to rise in their indignation at such methods and vote for the State's new saviour—Sutro.

The Fatal Counterplot

It happened however that a few days before the vote was taken one of Sutro's henchmen tipped off the plot to Fair. The result was that when the attorney went to Reno to get the warrant for the arrest of Drexler there was not a public officer to be found in the town to issue the necessary papers. The attorney had a fast team and drove to another town but found some mysterious individual ahead of him to block his game. Thus the fatal hour arrived for the taking of the vote in the Legislature and Drexler and what was left of his phalanx were all in place. The plans of the Sutro lieutenants were upset, the "floppers" failed to flop because the excuse to change had not materialized as promised, and the name of Fair went through with a whoop of victory. But the size of the barrel broached during the campaign still makes the eyes of the ordinary politician bulge.

His Curious Hallucination

The guests of one of our suburban hotels were afforded much amusement last Sunday morning by the predicament of a popular young army officer. He arrived at the hotel the night before in an automobile with some gay companions, one of whom was a very vivacious young woman, whom he registered as his wife. In the calm of the Sabbath morning the hallucination was dispelled. The spirit of romance had departed, storm clouds blackened the prospect; strongly contrasting with the Sabbath calm was the violent manner of the young woman, who caused something of a disturbance. The officer realizing that it was all a mistake, sent the young woman home, and then undertook to have a correction made in the hotel register. It was his desire that the hotel manager should be undeceived. Indeed he was most keen for an amendment, but he was sadly disappointed. According to the testimony of the register this gallant officer is no longer a bachelor.

Moffett's Rise in the Newspaper World

Samuel E. Moffett, the editor and writer who was drowned in the waters off the New Jersey coast last week, was one of the brightest spirits in the first flight of local newspapermen to the East some twelve years ago. He was born in St. Louis but came to California while yet a lad and received the major part of his education here. After graduating from the State University he attempted farming in the San Joaquin Valley but two dry years thoroughly changed all his inclinations in that direction and he returned to San Francisco. As a student he had dabbled in writing for the amateur press and meeting a number of his old school fellows who had adopted newspaper work he readily entered the field. His first employment was on the Evening Post, then under the management of T. T. Williams, than whom there was no better local trainer to teach a cub the business. Williams, in his keen, broad and incisive way, sketched out the scheme of each day's editorials to Moffett and the latter dressed them up. In this wise he very quickly learned the ropes, and acquired a reputation that led to quick advancement. He followed Arthur McEwen, when the latter assumed charge of the Examiner, and took a post graduate course under that brilliant penman. Moffett was among the picked lot of local newspapermen selected by Hearst when he made his invasion of New York journalism. In that ranging field Moffett's mind, quick to absorb and digest economic facts and questions of national and international importance, rapidly expanded. He was a nephew of Mark Twain who guided him into good places where his quick wit and natural attainments led to his encouragement. Shortly after Hearst purchased the Cosmopolitan he put Moffett in charge of that magazine but he quickly tired of that character of employment and joined the World editorial staff. When Collier broadened his weekly into a national publication in 1904 he selected Moffett to head the editorial staff and the Californian won wide distinction. He was the author of several works on political subjects, and a prominent member of many clubs and political, economic and scientific societies. Swimming was an exercise in which he prided himself and it ended his life. The surf was running unusually high and the wind was strong on the day he arrived at the beach. Very few swimmers dared venture in but Moffett, fresh on his vacation, was nothing daunted and eagerly plunged in. He finally reached the last post, clung to it and then was seen to throw up his hands and call for help. Life savers finally brought him ashore but the doctors pronounced him dead, though every effort was made to resuscitate him. His wife, two children and brother-in-law, Albert Tallman, were present on the beach during the painful scene.

"Does that promoter know anything about the mining business?"

"He starts in as if he were an experienced hand. I never saw prettier stationery."

determination to stir up trouble cannot long remain quiet. Of late he has been busy in his McCarthy-Machiavelian way laying wires and planting mines against the day when he figures an explosion will produce the most benefit to McCarthy and create widespread disaster among his enemies. Among the hostiles marked for slaughter is the Bricklayers Union, a strong and successful organization that has steadfastly refused to come into the McCarthy camp despite the inducements offered. Just now the union has a stiff fight on its hands with non-union masons over the big building being erected at Powell and O'Farrell streets. Is labor leader McCarthy doing what he can to stop this invasion of non-union men into union territory? Not a bit of it. The non-union men have the encouragement of McCarthy and if they win out it will be with his adroit endeavors. Through them he hopes to deal his long sought blow at the backbone of the Bricklayers Union. If McCarthy's present plans succeed he will gather what men he can from among these non-union bricklayers and organize them into the nucleus of a new union. The seed of this nucleus will be men completely under McCarthy's domination; it will consequently be McCarthy's organization heart and soul. He will carefully nurse this toddling union till it is big enough to walk and the first time thereafter that the present Bricklayers Union presents an opening he will declare a general strike on the building whereon they may be working. The only way the worried and perplexed contractors or builders may resume operations will be to take on McCarthy's nursling union and thus oust the regular Bricklayers Union. In following up this line of warfare against the unions that oppose him McCarthy always blacklists their boldest and strongest leaders and at the same time offers inducements to the weak kneed members to join his union and thereafter become subservent to him. In this way he broke the backbone of the Electrical Workers Union that went down in the general strike ordered by him in the Fairmont Hotel while in the course of construction. McCarthy simply uses unionism to crush every labor organization in the building trades that will not become his tool and truckle to him. No matter how good and sound the union may be if it threatens his proud title of Czar of the building trades he ruthlessly tries to smash it. That is one of the reasons he is taking advantage of the present plight of labor to smite his enemies.

Left Some Money After All

The local papers called attention to the poverty of Helen Dingeon who passed away recently at the German hospital, but devoted little space to the distinction she won as a singer. As a matter of fact she did not die in distress as the newspapers represented. Her will discloses that she left some seven thousand dollars, part of this was bequeathed to her mother and part to Mrs. John Kreling, who proved such a devoted friend during the last years of the invalid's life. Though Miss Dingeon made money fast in the palmy days of her stage career, from $100 to $300 a week, she spent it freely and this gave color to the report that she had very little left. But she had been taught a valuable lesson by a close friend and long ago several safe investments were made which she firmly refused to draw on. These investments helped in a great measure to lighten the sick burdens of herself and her mother during the past few years.

DINGEE PARK

REDWOOD CITY SAN MATEO COUNTY

A Perfect Suburban Residence Tract. Thirty-six Minutes from San Francisco.

Has just been re-subdivided and is now offered for sale by its owner, William J. Dingee, Crocker Building. It's two minutes from the station at Redwood City. About 30,000 square feet of cement sidewalks have already been laid and all the streets will be graded, macadamized and have cement curbs. A complete water system is to be added to the tract. Nothing will be neglected to make Dingee Park an ideal spot in which to live.

Miss Dingeon was born in New York and as a child showed so much talent that her parents sent her to Munich to study. She advanced very rapidly and at the age of ten was singing at the Royal Odeon there. Meanwhile her father had moved to this city and had become proprietor of the Maison Doree in Kearny street. After finishing her studies abroad Miss Dingeon followed him here and introduced herself to the public by appearing in sketches and operatic bits at the old California theatre, then under the management of John McCullough. Her first real engagement was in the "Queen's Lace Handkerchief," at the Bush street theatre, under Charles Locke. After a season there she toured America and Canada with Adelina Patti, playing second in the cast to that famous singer. The engagement wound up with a Patti season in New York. Then she joined the McCall opera company in Boston. In 1882 she returned here and became a member of the Tivoli company, opening in the "Masked Ball." For seven years she was very popular and scored in numbers of successes. Her marriage with Stieglitz proved unhappy and they soon parted. The settlement of her father's estate left her very little and when approaching sickness prevented her further appearance on the stage she retired with her mother to a very secluded life, seeing only those few staunch friends who were attracted by her whole souled and kindly personality.

Injured His Eyesight in Alaska

Rex Beach, whose latest novel, "The Barrier," is just fresh from the press, is reported to be in a Seattle hospital undergoing treatment for an affection which may cost him his sight. Mr. Beach went to Alaska a few weeks ago on a hunting trip in the Copper River country, and the undue exposure has caused a filmy growth which may eventually result in total blindness. There is always some allowance to be made for the inaccuracies of first reports, which, as Mark Twain had occasion to remark on the publication of the announcement of his death, are likely to be "greatly exaggerated." It may turn out that Mr. Beach is only suffering from some temporary strain which will rectify itself with rest. In any case, he has the sympathy and best hopes of his hosts of readers who have seen Alaska and its stirring scenes through his eyes.

Spellbinders of the Campaign

Who is going to be the star spellbinder in the present political campaign? In 1906 Bryan himself was easily the bright particular star of the Democratic side. The "cross of gold" speech that gained him the nomination for the Presidency catapulted him from obscurity into the national limelight. He was dazed somewhat by his sudden transition as was evidenced by his fiasco in the big meeting gotten up by Hearst at Madison Square Garden, New York, at the outset of the campaign. A little latter he pulled himself together and began a series of oratorical feats that astonished even his closest friends. In his campaign four years later he made even a better showing. In the interim he has mellowed in his powers and has acquired more tact and higher arts of persuasiveness. The season's star spellbinder in the Republican ranks is still to be developed. Will he shoot out of the darkness very much as Bryan did and as did that young stripling from the South who created a furore in New York and nearby cities in the last fortnight of the campaign of 1900? His name was Hugh Gordon Miller and Senator Scott is credited with discovering him in the hustings of Virginia. Scott took him north and bided his chance. One night there was a monster meeting in New York. Senator Depew's special train was caught in a washout, he failed to appear on the platform and Scott prevailed on the chairman to substitute his beardless young protege, Miller. Inside of ten minutes Miller had completely captivated the 10,000 men and women present. When he finished flags were seized and the cheering audience stampeded towards the platform to carry Miller through the streets at the head of a procession. They were finally restrained till the other speakers were heard. Then with a roar of enthusiasm they lifted Miller in the air and carried him to his hotel. A few days later at a gathering of business men in Wall street Miller again created so much political enthusiasm that the conservative business men present boosted him on their shoulders and carried him through the streets. Miller spoke at some half dozen meetings and in all of them he created unrestrained enthusiasm. Lyman J. Gage, then Secretary of the Treasury under President McKinley, was one of the speakers on the platform to follow the young Virginian at the time he swept the monster meeting in Philadelphia off its feet. Gage was present at the instance of the administration and was to deliver the single official speech of the campaign, the cabinet's position on the nation's money and credit, questions of paramount importance. The audience was still Miller mad when Gage delivered his message so the latter was feeling rather crusty when he returned to Washington the next day and McKinley asked him how he had fared. "It was a great meeting," was the reply, "but it was captured and almost stampeded by a youthful, intellectual and oratorical monstrosity."

THE FINANCIAL OUTLOOK

By R. E. Mulcahy

The bull campaign in Wall street stocks and bonds goes merrily on. More new high records have been made as compared with a week ago. The most noteworthy advance was seen in American Smelting common, which sold at 107, a gain of $10 per share, as compared with the prices of the previous week; the advance was followed closely by National Lead common, which sold at 92¼ as compared with 77 a week ago. Amalgamated Copper, Interborough common and preferred, and many of the smaller issues shared in the upturn to a fair degree. Brooklyn was advanced sharply on the 10 cent Brooklyn fare.

In the railway list, Reading was the most prominent, selling at 129¼, an advance of ten points during the past week.

The Harriman stocks attracted a great deal of attention; Southern Pacific common, and Union Pacific common advancing to new high marks. Southern Pacific is now selling within one dollar per share of its highest point during its existence. There seems no stop to the advancing tendency. Those well informed think Union Pacific common is booked for 200, while Southern Pacific common will go to 120 purely on merit.

Atchison common has shown a great deal of underlying strength. There is a very strong pool in this stock. It is thought their operations will soon be manifested.

The Gould properties are somewhat dormant, but will undoubtedly move forward in sympathy with the rest of the market.

The great strength shown in the Steel stocks has been one of the market features. The movement of Steel common, one way or the other, has acted as a barometer, many operators taking their cue from this particular feature. Those who are in charge of the market are working the group system; that is, certain stocks are taken in hand and marked up, after which another group is taken up, etc. Heretofore this manner of handling the market has been the forerunner of a rampant bull market. No better time could be had for a big bull campaign, as money is a drug on the market, and bankers are glad to find employment for their surplus in Wall street securities. The urgent demand for bonds has been reflected in the market value of these securities quite materially during the past month. Money is coming out of hiding and is seeking investment. A greater change in public sentiment than that which has been seen in the past two months has never been witnessed. It is only to be compared by going from utter darkness into daylight, which in reality means that our past depression was caused more through fear than from reality.

Railways will find it easy to finance their intended improvements; this will employ labor, and labor fully employed means our greatest circulating medium. Crops will be bountiful and prices for farm products will be high. Surely a bright future is ahead for at least two years. Local securities are showing more activity, buyers are more in evidence. Our street car, gas and electric and water systems are in a very prosperous condition, and are bound to invite investment in these securities.

Locally money conditions are gradually improving. It is only a question of a short period when the East will look to the Pacific Coast for investments. San Francisco is getting nearer New York every day—that in itself means prosperity to the whole coast.

The scientists are finding out many things about ancient nations, some of which may be true and some not. Inference is often advanced as fact. Guesses grow into possibilities, and possibilities into probabilities and probabilities into certainty. Dr. M. G. Kyle tells a story which illustrates one method of argument. An Assyriologist boasted to an Egyptologist that "the Assyrians understood electric telegraphy because we have found wire in Assyria." "Oh," said the other, "we have not found a scrap of wire in Egypt, therefore we know the Egyptians understood wireless telegraphy."

Stories That Startled the Club

What constitutes "strong language" is the question pricking the conscience of the Papyrus Club. Now the Papyrus ladies do not take themselves as seriously as some of their sister clubwomen. They do not expect to settle the destiny of nations, reform the Marcel wave, and bring back to our streets of Spanish nomenclature the glory and pride of real frijoli pronunciation. The Papyrus exists for amiable sociability, and insists only on one thing—every new member must pay besides her initiation dues, an entrance fee in the shape of a funny story, and of course any club member who has a quiver full of funny stories may cap it with as good as the new member sends. Seasons went by and the Emergency Hospital never reported that any one had broken her funny bone at the Papyrus. The stories were carefully expurgated before being delivered. One fatal day a new member told a story and right out in meeting called the horned gentleman, who is said to rule the nether world, by his real name. That reminded some one else of another story of the same geographical status, and she called the place by its given name. Of course it would have spoiled the point of both stories to trip over the names, but there were several members who gasped at what seemed to them sheer profanity. The ice having been chipped, there followed something like a run on this sort of thing. To be sure the necessary "cuss" words were really nice little lady-like affairs that would only offend the prudishly attuned ear. However there are evidently some ladies in this club who think that a dam is properly included in a course in hydraulics, but should be sluiced out of humorous stories as told by the gentler sex. This contingent was discovered in solemn council deciding that it is necessary to condemn "strong language." As is the case with all unofficial gatherings, various reports of their action have been circulating around. One club member says that really the only funny story that she has heard during her membership is this one which concerns itself with a Puritanical effort to amputate "strong language" from the club vocabulary, when as a matter of fact the language has never been strong enough to stand by itself against a gentle breeze.

Fluffy Ruffles on the Spot

Laundry bills are the fences which people with abbreviated incomes find difficult to climb. But up on the McCloud river a well known young matron found a way out of her difficulty. A woman and her lingerie are soon parted in a modern laundry and so householders who can afford it have established laundries in their homes. The convenience of this is obvious in remote country places but in few establishments is one conducted on the scale of this country home on the McCloud. A Frenchman and his wife, imported straight from the province where blanchisseuses are the chief article of export, are installed in the laundry and the house guests in this hospitable home do not have to send their fluffy ruffles to San Francisco to be tubbed. A young matron recently arrived at the place followed by several more pieces of luggage than usually accompany a visit to the mountains. Soon their was a chattering and a babble in the laundry that reached the kitchen and passed on to the maids who not only whispered it to their mistress but to the other house guests. The canny young matron, having heard of the laundry, had been saving up her elaborate peignoirs and all the rest of the hand embroidered things for weeks and had brought them there to be laundered!

Caught in the Occult Wave

An occult wave is vibrating in the fashionable suburbs, and though the men wear their auras rather rakishly over one ear, many of the women are seriously trying to put their soul vibrations in accord with the eternal harmonies of the occult. Several months ago an Indian "doctor" came as a guest to the old Mills place near San Mateo. The present tenants of the place and their friends found balm for their sorely perplexed spiritual outreachings in the gutteral teachings of this Red Man. Some of the less psychic villagers hinted that he would

"shake with Destiny for beer" or shuffle a greasy poker pack as diligently as his brother "poor Lo." Whether the occult wave which now reaches from San Jose to Burlingame had its beginning at this place is a matter of conjecture, but at any rate a great many people down that way are now dabbling in the occult, and it is the fad to "visualize in color." As money is the most cherished commodity in all fashionable precincts, the majority are cultivating a green haze in front of their eyes as that verdant shade is said to perceptibly fatten one's bank account.

Seeking the Mystic in Burlingame

Everyone in Burlingame who has acquired a sudden fancy for the occult has an assorted stock of swinging glass balls, and the guest selects the color most needful to her wants, hangs it in a shadowy corner of her room, and concentrates her gaze upon it for a stated length of time during intervals of the day. The effect of these colored glass balls is not instantaneous like the high ball which may account for the preference most men show for the latter. One chatelaine of a handsome country house has gone so far as to fit up a room where no undesirable vibrations or sounds in error may penetrate and interfere with work in the occult. Any of her guests are at liberty to use this room but so far the hostess herself is the enthusiast who most frequently retreats to its mystic shadows.

Local Students in the Mystic

While this fad is still young down Burlingame way there are a number of well known women in San Francisco who have long been students of the occult. Mrs.

MRS. ADOLPH SPRECKELS

Mrs. Spreckels was Miss Alma de Brettville, well known in local art circles. Her recent quiet marriage in Philadelphia to Adolph Spreckels proved a great surprise to their families and friends. Mr. and Mrs. Spreckels are now touring Europe.

A. W. Scott, the prominent clubwoman, who has been identified with every movement that makes for public improvement, has long been a researcher in the occult. Mrs. Scott has a room in her home fitted up for occult investigation, and her friends who are interested along the same line of thought are permitted to use it, though her general acquaintance is of course excluded.

Wedding Was a Surprise

The wedding on Wednesday evening, August 12th, of Miss Jeannette Wright, eldest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Kirkham Wright, to Edward Torney, son of Colonel and Mrs. George Torney of the Presidio, came as a great surprise to their many friends as it was scheduled to take place in October. The ceremony was performed at the residence of the bride's parents in Broadway. The guests included members of the family and most intimate friends only. Rev. Father Ramm officiated. Miss Marion Wright, the bride's sister, a beautiful brunette, served as maid of honor. Her gown was a rare creation of the modiste's art, a soft yellow fabric, which was very becoming to her jet black hair and eyes. Little Miss Jeanette Langley, cousin of the bride, and Master Jack Ryan, nephew of the groom, were the only other attendants. The decorations were entirely in yellow. The illumination of the spacious home was entirely by candle light and in varied tones of yellow. The ceremony was one of the most artistic in every detail which has taken place recently. The Wright family belong to our oldest and most prominent set. Kirkham Wright, a southerner of Mississippi, is a brother of the late Judge Selden S. Wright and a nephew of the late General R. W. Kirkham, after whom Kirkham street, Oakland, was named. Mrs. Wright was Miss Millie Langley of Oakland's exclusive set. Her only brother is Mr. Charles Langley, the wholesale druggist of this city. The announcement that Mr. and Mrs. Wright are on the eve of departure for a lengthy tour abroad is without foundation. They returned from Europe only recently with their interesting daughters.

Will Be Married Abroad

Mrs. Caroline Green Noble left this week for New York en route to Rome where she will meet her daughter, Miss Cara Pickens Noble, whose wedding will take place late in October to Victor Kohnk, a wealthy German of Hamburg. Miss Noble is a granddaughter of the late General Duff Green. Mrs. Green, the grandmother, was Miss Rebecca Pickens, daughter of General Pickens of South Carolina, and also related to the Calhouns. Edward B. Noble, brother of the prospective bride, is associated with his father, Patrick Noble, in the Pacific Rolling Mills of this city. Miss Noble left California for New York several years ago where she perfected herself in the languages. Later she was sent to Rome where she represented and established the Institute of Social Service, which has gained a world wide reputation. Recently she rented a house in Rome and established a Co-operative Woman's Club in touch with clubs of Berlin and Paris for wandering women who have no homes. Queen Margarite is very favorable impressed with her work along these lines. Miss Noble is still in her early twenties and has had a notable career abroad for one of her years. Mrs. Noble will return to California after the wedding in October.

Smart Tea for Debutantes

What promises to be one of the most elaborate teas of the season is scheduled for October 31st at Century Hall, when Mrs. Charles Keeney will be the hostess. The affair will be given in honor of her debutante daughter, Miss Innes Keeney. A bevy of beautiful debutantes will assist the hostess in receiving. As runaway matches and surprises seem to be in order some body suggested the other day that perhaps the fond mother might be called upon to welcome a son-in-law on this occasion. All her friends are aware of the deep devotion of the out of town banker's son for the beautiful young girl.

Found a Bride in Stockton

Announcement of the engagement of Miss Marie Glenn, one of the prettiest of Stockton's younger belles, and Ralph W. Weymouth, a clever young architectural engineer of San Francisco, is the culmination of a three months' acquaintance and wooing. Mr. Weymouth came to Stockton in connection with plans for the new half million dollar hotel which Stockton is building—and that settled it. The wedding will take place in the early winter. It is to be a church affair with Miss Lucille Budd, maid of honor, and Mrs. B. J. Powell, matron of honor. Miss Glenn will be a beautiful bride. She is rather petite and has superb coloring, a combination of brown hair, blue eyes and peachy cheeks.

Furnishes Brides for San Francisco

It amounts almost to grand larceny the way San Francisco chaps are carrying away Stockton's society girls. The list even for very recent years is a long one. Beginning this past month and going back just a little way there was Jean Read who became Mrs. O'Higgins; Anna Fyfe who is the bride of Bishop Hamilton's son; Sue Nicol who became Mrs. Robert Hayes Smith and is now on her way to Europe; Jeannette Gillis who is Mrs. Alexander Bryant; Mabel Thompson who is Mrs. Edward Haas; Blossom Simon who became Mrs. David Steiner; Carra Cobb and Georgia Bogue who became the brides of Frank and Harry Long; Hedwig Rosenbaum who had but one short year of happiness as Mrs. Julius Israel and became a widow and a mother at about the same time; Gertrude Elliott, one of our bachelor girls and prominent musically, became Mrs. James Littlehale; she by the way is a cousin of Miss Glenn, the pretty bride-elect before mentioned. Miss Ewing is now Mrs. Harry Marsh; one of the Welsh girls, Grace, became Mrs. W. E. Elliott some years ago and now her youngest sister Maud's engagement has been announced to another San Franciscan, Mr. Dutton. There are others who "left their happy homes" for San Francisco, but the ones mentioned are among those most prominent and more recent. Stockton boys have tried to balance accounts by "importing" brides, but not in anything like a compensating ratio. John Fisher went to Illinois, Howard Hammond to Kentucky and Jo Peters and Fred Read to San Francisco for brides.

Outdoor Pastimes at Del Monte

An era of outdoor sports is setting in at Del Monte. Golfing on the fine eighteen-hole course, horseback riding, driving, automobiling, lawn tennis, swimming in the surf or tank, cycling and walking—these recreations are enjoyed constantly. The bowling alleys, the billiard tables and the card tables have their devotees. In addition to all these sports and recreations, the management has recently provided a court for raqueta, an easier and less violent form of lawn tennis. The large lawn to the southeast of the rose garden has been set aside for new and improved croquet, which is played almost with the accuracy of billiards, with large balls, heavy mallets and "wickets" (or hoops) barely half-an-inch wider than the diameter of the ball. So expert are the players of the new croquet that it is no uncommon thing for a skillful player in good form to make two rounds of the lawn without an error or miss. A highly interesting game that has been introduced recently is lawn bowls, which is one of the oldest outdoor recreations. It is mentioned several times in the English history of the earliest sports. Bowling on the green, as it is often called, was enjoyed by New Yorkers in ante-Revolutionary days, the lower end of Broadway, near the Battery, New York, being known still as Bowling Green. The game affords good, though not violent, exercise and needs no special preparation in the way of dress. The lawn to the west of the club house has been set apart for bowling on the green; and every afternoon until it is high time to go in and dress for dinner ladies and gentlemen may be seen enjoying the game. Between the bowling green and the club house is the clock golf green,

Social Diversions at Pacific Grove

Pacific Grove has been the mecca for an unusually large number of summer resort visitors this year and the pretty little village has been more than ordinarily gay in consequence. Every day nearly there is a bridge party, a tea or some other little social diversion which serves to pass the time pleasantly. Last week the principal affair was the bridge party given by Mrs. Joseph Trilley, in honor of Mrs. John Leicester Sehon, who has been visiting Mrs. W. H. H. Chapman at the Monterey Presidio. Mr. and Mrs. Paris Kilborn have closed their pretty home at Pacific Grove and have left for an extended trip East. Their destination is New York City where they will spend some time with Mr. Kilborn's daughter, Mrs. Herbert Leighton. Mrs. G. A. Phinney of Sacramento and Miss Clare Phinney, who are spending the summer at the Pacific Grove Hotel, were joined during the week by Mr. Phinney and his son, A. Van V. Phinney. Dr. Hubert Rowell and party of Berkeley were among those who spent the week-end at the hotel.

Engagement in the Navy

The engagement of Lieutenant Ernest Friedrick to Miss Mabel Claire Southard has just been announced. Lieutenant Friedrick is the commander of the torpedo boat Hopkins, one of the mosquito fleet which followed the big battleship fleet from the Atlantic to this port. He is now at the Mare Island Navy Yard with his vessel. Miss Southard is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Charles H. Southard of Baldwin, Long Island, N. Y. When Lieutenant Friedrick slipped away a few weeks ago on a vacation trip to the East, it was surmised by his friends that it was a pilgrimage of sentiment. This week he returned to Mare Island and announced his engagement to Miss Southard, with whose family he spent his vacation.

Reported Engaged

Friends of Grove L. Johnson, the well known attorney and state politician and father of Hiram Johnson, are congratulating him on his engagement to Miss Alice Hassett, daughter of former Mayor Hassett of Sacramento. Miss Hassett is a remarkably bright young woman with many friends. For a long time she acted as private secretary to her father and relieved him of a great many of the details of his public and private business. She is very popular in Sacramento society. Grove Johnson has taken part in some of the biggest California law cases, has represented the State in Congress and is one of the best known Sacramentans.

Motor Parties at Del Monte

My Monterey correspondent writes me that the social season is in full swing at Del Monte and the hotel is crowded with guests. There is a constant succession of arrivals and everyone is looking forward with keen anticipation to the week of sports which will begin with the Dog Show on the 28th and 29th, to be followed by the golf tournament which will extend from August 31st to September 5th, and the tennis tournament which begins September 7th.

Mrs. Charles B. Alexander arrived at the hotel on Friday accompanied by her three daughters, Miss Harriet Alexander, Miss Janetta Alexander and Miss M. C. Alexander. They left on Monday but will return later to make a visit of several weeks. Mr. and Mrs. Walter Scott Martin, Miss Jennie Crocker, Harry Scott and S. E. Sherwin came down from Burlingame on Friday and were joined on Saturday by Charles J. Freeborn, whose mother before her marriage to James Freeborn was Miss Nellie Smith, one of the handsome Smith sisters who were such belles in San Francisco in the early seventies.

Miss Crocker is very sweet and unaffected, dresses simply and wears very few jewels. The party while here spent their time bowling, motoring and swimming, Miss Crocker being an adept at the latter sport.

Mrs. E. H. Harriman, Miss Harriman and Miss Carol Harriman arrived in their private car on Thursday and on Sunday departed for San Mateo where they will be the guests of Mr. and Mrs. William H. Crocker for a few day before joining Mr. Harriman at his hunting lodge on the shores of upper Klamath Lake.

Other distinguished guests at Del Monte last week were Judge Alton B. Parker, former Democratic candidate for the Presidency, who was accompanied by Delancey Nicoll of New York. They motored to Del Monte from Paso Robles and are en route to the annual meeting of the American Bar Association to be held in Seattle.

Mrs. Swinburne, wife of Admiral W. T. Swinburne, who has been here since the visit of the fleet in May, will leave in a few days as she plans to sail for Honolulu the latter part of the month in order to be there during the visit of the Pacific Squadron.

Other arrivals at the hotel were General C. R. Greenleaf, United States Army (retired) and Mrs. Greenleaf, who have come for a visit of a couple of months; Mr. and Mrs. Horace D. Pillsbury, who will spend a few weeks here; Mr. and Mrs. S. W. Heller and Miss F. Stern, who have settled themselves for the remainder of the summer; Mr. and Mrs. R. G. Hanford, who motored here for a day's visit to return later for the golf tournament; Mrs. J. D. Peters, Miss Anna Peters, and Mrs. Edward Barron and her daughter.

In the Social Spotlight

Mrs. J. B. Coryell entertained a house party recently, numbering twenty-two guests. On Monday evening last she gave a picnic at La Honda. The guests left Menlo Park at 3 p. m. in a tally-ho coach, while the guests from the city went by auto. Dinner was cooked al fresco, and as it grew dusk a huge bon fire furnished a weird light, the entire party drove back to the Coryell home at Menlo Park in the wee sma' hours.

Mrs. Darling of Nome, formerly Miss Etta Birdsall of Sacramento, is visiting in this city. Mrs. Laura Clark Wright made Mrs. Darling the motif of a tea last week, at the residence of her mother, Mrs. Clark, Presidio Terrace. It was a reunion of girl friends from Sacramento and was most enjoyable affair.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Sutro, who have been spending the summer out of town, have returned to pass the winter at the St. Francis.

After a three weeks sojourn along Monterey bay Mr. and Mrs. Robert G. Hooker have returned to their San Mateo home.

Colonel Marion P. Maus of Monterey, who succeeds General Funston, arrived with Mrs. Maus last Sunday at the Hotel St. Francis, where he will make his temporary headquarters.

Emil Steinegger has returned from his summer vacation and has resumed his instructions to pupils on the pianoforte.

Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Carrigan will give up their home in Sausalito in a fortnight and return to town.

Mr. and Mrs. William R. Hearst, accompanied by Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Shean, all of New York, motored down from Pleasanton where they have been spending a short time at Mrs. Phoebe Hearst's magnificent home. They were guests of the Fairmont while here.

Miss Marion Zeile is now planning to go abroad to complete her studies.

Mr. and Mrs. William Cluff and Miss Cluff have returned from their trip abroad.

W. P. Hammond and family are back in town from their motor trip through the south.

Among those registered at Byron Hot Springs are Mr. and Mrs. F. L. Hilmer, Mr. and Mrs. M. W. Levy, Mr. and Mrs. John T. Gilmartin, Mr. Harry Leap, Dr. Louis Stern and Mrs. Henry Williams, from San Francisco; Mrs. Henry Wetherbee from Fruitvale; Mrs. S. Martin from New York City; Prof. and Mrs. E. C. Atkinson from Sacramento and Mr. and Mrs. F. E. Baker from San Mateo.

Mr. and Mrs. Seth Mann and Mr. and Mrs. Bush Fennell of San Francisco are guests at Aetna Springs.

This week was a gay one at the Mare Island Navy Yard, Rear Admiral and Mrs. Swinburne being made the motif of a number of special affairs Tuesday evening. The girls of the navy yard gave a bal poudre, their guests of honor being the officers of the fleet. On Wednesday there was a matinee dance on the West Virginia, given by the officers of the vessels in honor of Admiral and Mrs. Swinburne. On Thursday evening the officers and ladies of Mare Island gave the regular fortnightly dance in the sail loft. On Friday an informal dance took place in the club house, attended by only the younger set. Another matinee shipboard dance on Saturday closed one of the most delightful weeks enjoyed at the navy yard.

Mr. and Mrs. Earle Talbot, who have been living in New York, are just now the guests of Mrs. Talbot's parents. They will sail shortly for Korea where Mr. Talbot has business interests that will engage his attention for several years.

Admiral Swinburne and Mrs. Swinburne have been at the St. Francis for the past few days. When the Admiral goes to Honolulu in command of the Pacific Squadron Mrs. Swinburne intends to go over to the island accompanied by Mrs. Emile Bruguire.

Mr. and Mrs. W. B. Tubbs of Burlingame are guests at Aetna Springs.

Dixie-land will prevail in the parlors of the St. Francis Hotel, Thursday evening, August 20, when Miss Louise A. Williams of Augusta, Georgia, will give impersonations of the darkies of the South. Miss Williams is a daughter of the distinguished ex-Confederate veteran, the late A. B. Williams. The patronesses on Thursday evening are the following well known society ladies: Mrs. Eleanor Martin, Mrs. Phoebe Hearst, Mrs. Selden S. Wright, Mrs. W. G. Pritchard, Mrs. Wm. Keith, Mrs. H. T. Fergueson, Mrs. C. F. Pond, Mrs. W. H. Beatty, Mrs. Patrick Calhoun, Mrs. C. Edward Brown, and Mrs. W. M. S. Beede.

Miss Mary Joliffe and Frances Joliffe are the guests of their cousin, Mrs. Cryan, on her estate in Ireland. Mrs. Cryan was Miss Minnie Mathews of Oakland.

The wedding of Miss Anna Foster and Dr. Laurence Draper has been set for Saturday afternoon, August 22nd, at the San Rafael home of Mr. and Mrs. A. W. Foster.

Miss Edith Jones of San Rafael will sail for Honolulu September 11th. There she will remain as the guest of her sister, Mrs. Hines, till the following month when her marriage with Mr. Cooper, an Englishman in the diplomatic service of Siam, will take place.

Mrs. Frederick Funston will remain at Fort Mason until next month when she will visit her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Otto Blankart, in Oakland for several weeks. On account of the Kansas heat Mrs. Funston and the children will not follow General Funston to Fort Leavenworth till sometime in October.

Mr. and Mrs. Robert Oxnard have been visiting Mr. and Mrs. Horace Blanchard Chase at their country home, Stag's Leap, Napa County.

Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt, Jr. is motoring through Switzerland. In her party are Mrs. Belmont, Miss Greer and Mrs. Henry Lehr.

John Vance Cheney, Superintendent of the Newberry Library, Chicago, and Mrs. Cheney are registered at the Hotel de Rome. Across the way from their hotel appartment they had a chance of inspecting the Kaiser's gigantic new $3,000,000 Royal Library, which is approaching completion at a snail's pace. The library, which will have room for 5,000,000 volumes, will be the largest in the world.

Commander J. B. Milton has recently been relieved from the command at Mare Island at his own request and has been assigned to the command of the "Independence." Mrs. Milton was Miss Hattie Steele, granddaughter of the late Commodore R. B. Cunningham, U. S. N., in command of the Navy Yard many years ago. Miss Mattie Milton and Maxwell Milton, well known in society, are the son and daughter of Commander and Mrs. Milton.

Dr. and Mrs. P. L. Wheeler have returned from Santa Barbara.

Mrs. R. C. Foute will leave the St. Xavier, where she has spent the winter, and take rooms at the Hillcrest.

Mrs. Mary Keeney was hostess at an enjoyable luncheon during the week at the home of her parents in Clay street. Among the guests were Miss Florence Breckenridge, the Misses Calhoun and Gussie Foute.

Mr. and Mrs. David Edwards of Oakland are looking for a house in Bolinas with the idea of remaining there all winter. David Edwards is a son of Mrs. Henry Butters of Piedmont. Mrs. Edwards is the niece of Mrs. Wetherbee of Fruitvale.

Mrs. J. B. Coryell gave a delightful moonlight picnic at her home in Menlo Park on Monday evening, August 10th.

Miss Evelyn Norwood is the guest of Miss Ethel Lincoln at "Ethelinlde," St. Helena.

Mrs. Robert N. Graves, who has been visiting Mrs. Jerome Lincoln for the past three weeks, is now stopping at White Sulphur Springs where she will remain for some time.

On Monday evening, August 10th, Mrs. Edgar Wilson gave a tug party around the bay, the guests being the friends of Miss Maud Wilson and Miss Anita Mailliard. A dinner on board and dancing followed a glorious evening. Mrs. Wilson was one of the attractive Forbes girls of San Rafael.

Mr. and Mrs. J. D. Spreckels and Mrs. Harry Holbrook have gone to Coronado for three weeks.

Judge and Mrs. Van Fleet have closed their Inverness cottage for the summer and have returned to town.

Mr. and Mrs. Frederick McNear have just engaged a house in town for the winter.

Miss Hooker of San Francisco, Mrs. Samuel Knight of Burlingame, and Miss Land of New York, are guests of Mrs. George Lent at Aetna Springs.

Mrs. Timlow, Evelyn Carolan, is here on a visit from her eastern home and just now is staying with the Francis Carolans at the Crossways, Burlingame.

Theodore F. Jewell, Rear Admiral U. S. N., retired, accompanied by Mrs. Jewell, has taken apartments for a short time at the Fairmont.

Among Los Angeles visitors at the Fairmont during the past week were C. E. Sanger, J. M. Taylor, Mrs. Milo Baker and Miss Belle Baker, Lewis Bradbury, Geo. F. Tweedy, W. P. Dunham, G. A. Whitford and Mr. and Mrs. E. Avery McCarthy.

A change has been made in the wedding plans of Miss Madeleine Bohrmann and H. Clay Miller. Charles Foster, in whose home in Ross Valley the ceremony is to be held, will be obliged to leave for the East several days earlier than was expected. The wedding has therefore been reset for the 30th so that he may be present.

True Romance at the Alcazar

By the Alcazar clientele White Whittlesey is evidently regarded as the ideal hero of the true romance. Give him a drama pregnant with thrilling adventures and palpitating with the heart throbs of true love that wins its bliss against all obstacles and he packs the house with rapt and enthusiastic devotees. "Soldiers of Fortune," that capital story of South American adventure as evolved by Richard Harding Davis and stage fashioned by Augustus Thomas' offers just such an opportunity as evolved Whittlesey delights in. In all respects it is a matinee girl's ideal drama. The play has been produced here before and never fails to fill the house. In it Whittlesey is afforded scope to display charms of manner which seem to hypnotize his admirers. To them there is a spirit in his action, a sincerity in his sentiment, a pellucid note in his earnestness, a subtlety in his love making that less delicate artists seek in vain to simulate. The play offers capital chances to Bessie Barriscale and the other members of the company. Since Miss Barriscale won the hearts of the audience by her portrayal of the part of Juanita in "The Rose of the Rancho" she has made no more charming success. She displayed a variety delicacy and breadth in her powers which delighted those who are following the development of her powers as disclosed in the plays offered her for appearance. Louise Brownell scored again as a haughty dame. The stronger lines of expression are Miss Brownell's forte and every time she is fortunate enough to be cast in them she succeeds in winning the strong commendations of her admirers. Clever Anita Murray is sure to win applause when cast in a part which commands good character acting. For a play of this character the company is splendidly equipped with such good all round adaptable actors as Fred Butler, John B. Maher, Burt Wesner, Howard Hickman, Ernest Glendenning, Will Walling and Walter Belasco. As usual the management spared no pains and expense in giving the play a superb production.

The New Plays of Next Season

American plays by American playwrights is evidently the year's slogan judging from the list of plays now on record to be produced the forthcoming season. Among them are dramatizations of several well known novel successes. Charles Klein, Wm. Gillette, Langdon Mitchell, Booth Tarkington, Rex Beach, George Broadhurst and George Hobert are among those scheduled for productions. September will see a number of them running on Broadway. Mr. Klein's play is called "The Michief Makers." The story revolves in part around a murder which the police investigate. A drunken man who has been in a room adjoining the scene of the murder is accused of the crime. Mr. Klein's argument is that by persistent mental torture, prolonged suggestion, and the influence of hypnotism an innocent man may be forced into a confession of crime. In this particular instance he makes the drunken man confess guilt after five hours of the persecution which the public have come to know as "the third degree."

The reading public is familiar with the plot of Rex Beach's Alaskan novel. "The Barrier" is a story of primitive passions; a romance of a great love and a great hate. The reader who knows the theatre can see the possibilities of Theodore Roberts in the part of Poleon Doret, the Canadian, with the great climax of the rescue of the girl and the fight on the river bar between the half breed and the desperado.

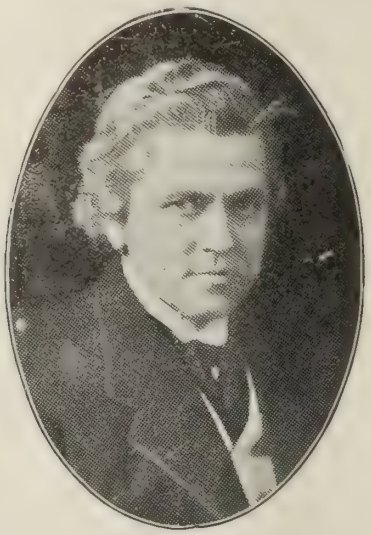
Extraordinary Scenic Effects

The new play by Frederic Thompson and Paul Armstrong ha sbeen named "The Test," but it is possible that another title will be chosen before the date of production. This is a modern story. Two extraordinary scenes are promised. One of these scenes is laid in the foundry room of a private arsenal for the manufacture of gigantic marine guns. The blast furnaces will be shown, the molten metal will run about the stage, workmen stripped to the waist will carry on the play amid the din of the rolling mill, and the whole stage will present a picture utterly unlike anything ever seen before.

The other scene is laid in the wireless room of a big Pacific liner. It is promised that this scene will be the most exciting marine picture the New York stage has ever held. The whole act is to be played amid a terrific storm. The wreck of a private yacht in the distant night and the transmission of wireless messages between this yacht and the liner furnish the background for the action. One of the two big scenes was not written by Mr. Thompson or Mr. Armstrong, but by a hitherto unknown playwright, who read a short story and saw in it dramatic possibilities.

The Coming Warfield Engagement

David Warfield's engagement at the Alcazar commences early in September. The opening play will be "The Music Master," through which he has achieved his widest fame and greatest popularity. This remarkable drama enters upon the fifth year of its extraordinary career. Excepting a brief road tour, in which a few of the largest cities were included, a little over a year ago, it has played for four consecutive seasons in New York City, and "capacity business" prevailed at every performance. "The Music Master," which is in three acts, is by Charles Klein, and was moulded, vivified and produced by the master of stagecraft, David Belasco. San Francisco will have an opportunity of seeing Mr. Warfield in "A Grand Army Man," his newer Belasco success, in which he rises to even greater artistic heights than he has attained in his previous, and in other respects, none the less notable triumphs. Mr. Belasco is one of the co-authors of "A Grand Army Man." It was produced last season in New York at his new Stuyvesant Theatre.



"HENRY MILLER AS STEPHEN GHENT"

Mr. Miller will be seen again in his characterization of this strong part in "The Great Divide," at the Van Ness Theatre, commencing Monday night, August 17th.

Romantic Play at the Alcazar

Vocal music will be a feature of "Heartsease," the romantic play scheduled to follow "Soldiers of Fortune" at the Alcazar. A picket octet, of which Mr. Homer Henley and Mrs. Millie Flynn Gish are the principals, will sing a number of operatic selections during the third act, and throughout the play songs will be heard. Mr. Henley was engaged to come from Sacramento, where he has resided since the fire, to arrange the music and conduct the rehearsals, and Mrs. Gish is assisting Mr. Henley. Both of these artists sang in the first Alcazar presentation of "Heartsease," about five years ago, when White Wittlesey made one of his big hits in the part of Eric Temple. It is a pretty costume play, the period being the seventeenth century, with the scenes laid in London and rural England. The story hinges upon the theft of an opera which Temple had written. Heartbroken, he goes into retirement, but is induced to go to a theatre in London, where he hears his work being sung, another man, Sir Geoffrey Pomfret (Mr. Walling), getting the credit for its composition. The two men meet in the foyer of the playhouse and have an altercation and in the final act

DAVID WARFIELD

Who will begin a season at the Alcazar Theatre early in September, opening in "The Music Master."

Temple defeats his enemy in a sword duel and comes to his rights. Of course there is also a young lady in the case, and Bessie Barriscale is admirably adapted to give her faithful representation, as she is a sweet girl of aristocratic parentage. All the other Alcazar favorites will be suitably cast in "Heartsease," and the staging will disclose some very beautiful pictures.

Special Privileges to Music Teachers

Manager Will L. Greenbaum has succeeded in making arrangments with several prominent European and Eastern managers to give special rates for concert tickets to active music students and their teachers as well as to teachers in public and private schools. All teachers desirous of securing these special privileges for their pupils should address Mr. Greenbaum at Lyric Hall, San Francisco. This will bring them full information, programmes, etc. One of the principal advantages of European music study is the opportunities for hearing great artists. With the large number of high class artists that Manager Greenbaum has been bringing here the past few seasons and the large number of excellent teachers now located in this vicinity San Francisco is very little behind the big cities of the old world.

"The Great Divide" at the Van Ness Again

For the farewell week of his highly successful season at the Van Ness Theatre, Henry Miller, that finished and versatile actor-manager, will repeat "The Great Divide," which play scored such a triumph at the opening of his engagement. The picturesqueness and absorbing interest of this drama made it as great a hit in this city as it has been in New York and throughout the East. Its fortnight's run could have been easily extended for an entire month, but Mr. Miller had previously arranged to bring his associate players all the way across the continent with "The Servant in the House," and then there was also his original production of the new MacKaye comedy, "Mater"; so that "The Great Divide" had to be temporarily withdrawn in spite of the enthuiastic audiences nightly crowding the Van Ness. It is no wonder that this sterling play, which so happily combines both high literary value with deep human interest and with stirring melodramatic situation, should have appealed with such widespread effectiveness. The first act climax, in which the rough western mountaineer (Stephen Ghent) violently breaks into the lonely cabin on the Arizona cactus ranch and abducts the helpless girl as his bride, is a situation that is intense and would be too daring in the hands of an inferior playwright. William Moody, the author, has treated this scene, as well as all the curious complications of the play, in a delicate and yet masterful manner. As Ghent, Mr. Miller gives the most virile characterization of his career.

Coming: "The Man of the Hour" play a year ago. A special feature of this engagement will be the engagement of Mr. Cyril Scott for the role of the Mayor. Mr. Scott has been for the last three years the successful star of "The Prince Chap." Miss Mary ("Polly") Stockwell, daughter of that rare old San Francisco favorite, L. R. Stockwell, comes as leading woman of the company, in the role of Dallas Wainwright, the heiress-ward of the unscrupilous politico-financier. Miss Ethel Brandon, another favorite here and the mother of Miss Stockwell, returns in her role of the Mayor's mother, and two other successful players of last year's cast, Louis Hendricks and Felix Haney, come back in their racy creations of the Big Boss and Alderman Jim Phelan, respectively. Seats for "The Man of the Hour" will be ready on Thursday morning, August 20th.

Captivating Opera at the American

"The Love Tales of Hoffman," one of the big hits of the grand opera season in New York and the most popular of the new offerings at the Manhattan Opera House, will be superbly presented at the American theatre during the week beginning Sunday, August 23. The story deals with Hoffmann, a dissipated young German poet, who is found leading the drinking chorus in a tavern one night when some one suggests that he amuse his fellow revelers by telling about his three love affairs. The poet consents. The curtain falls and the stories are enacted in the three acts which follow. They are all fascinating, full of romance and told to colorful and sympathetic music. No effort has been spared on the part of the management to give the production a beautiful setting and a strong cast. Over sixty people will appear on the stage. The leading roles will be taken by such well known favorites as Edith Mason, Bernice Holmes, Ann Tasker, Thomas H. Persse, Charles Swickard and Joseph Fogarty. Paul Steindorf, who ranks so high as a musical director, will be in charge of the orchestra which will be augmented to twenty-eight pieces for the occasion. Popular prices.

Ferris Hartman at the Princess

Ferris Hartman, the most popular of all comic opera and musical comedy comedians will begin a brief engagement at the Princess Theatre this Monday night. Four years have elapsed since Mr. Hartman last appeared in this city and he is sure of an enthusiastic welcome for he is probably the greatest stage favorite that San Francisco possesses. He has wisely chosen for the renewal of his acquaintance with us the merry musical comedy by Harry B. Smith and Victor Herbert, "The Idol's Eye." It was in this play that he scored in the role of Abel Conn, an American magician traveling in India for the purpose of learning new tricks from the Hindu jugglers in order to mystify his countrymen on his return home. Elaborate scenery and costumes have been prepared and every effort will be made to render the production a notable one. Arthur Cunningham will repeat a former triumph as Don Pablo Tobasco and Wallace Brownlow, who is already as popular at the Princess as he was at the Tivoli in the days gone by, will have a congenial character in New Winner, an American novelist. Pretty Zoe Barnett is happily cast as Damayanti, the favorite Nautch girl of the Rajah of Jabalpus, Evelyn Frances Kellogg will be Maraquita and Sarah Edwards will have abundant lyric and dramatic opportunity as the Chief Priestess of the Temple of the Ruby. The run of "The Idol's Eye" will be limited to one week only. It will be followed by a superb production of "The Toy Maker" with Mr. Hartman in the title role. "The Girl From Paris" will be given for the last times this Sunday afternoon and evening.

Startling New Acts at the Orpheum

The bill at the Orpheum for the week beginning this Sunday matinee will be headed by the famous Four Rianes, who it will be remembered created a perfect furore on their last appearance in this city. They will present their original and novel comedy acrobatic sketch, "In Africa," in which they recently scored a tremendous success at the New York Hippodrome. The Gotham press declared they possessed a skill and originality that completely baffled imitation. Charles H. Bradshaw, one of the best and most popular of American comedians will present a laughable farce entitled, "Fix in a Fix," which abounds in mirthful and surprising complications and is rich in bright and witty dialogue. The Big City Quartette, pronounced by eastern critics to be the sweetest singing four in vaudeville, will be a delightful feature of the coming entertainment. The first tenor is Fred G. Rover; the second tenor, Geoffrey O'Hara; the baritone, Jack Hamilton and the bass Gus Reed. Raffin's simian performers will surely awaken the astonishment of the audience. A feature of this novel act is Charming, a little monk who imitates Charmion in her much discussed disrobing act on a trapeze. Other amusing incidents include the Merry Widow waltzers and the flying trapeze baboons. In consequence of the enthusiastic recognition which has been accorded to the gifted young lyric soprano, Miss May Carranza, her engagement has been extended for another week. Bernard and Seeley, The Tennis Trio, and Franklyn Underwood & Co. will conclude their engagement with this programme. Mr. Underwood, with the assistance of Frances Slosson and George Bloomquest, will present a new sketch written for him by A. C. Carson of Denver, entitled "Mr. Stung's Mistake." A new series of Orpheum Motion Pictures will terminate the performance.

Henry Miller has decided upon "The Great Divide" as the play in which he will make his London appearance during the coming season.

Auto Notes

Mrs. C. C. Clay of Fruitvale, who for a fortnight had been chaperoning a party of merry young people on a motoring tour through Southern California, returned home Thursday night in her Thomas Flyer.

Mrs. A. L. Buckley and her son Frank have returned home here after a stay of two months at Soda Bay, Lake County, from which place they enjoyed side rides to all of the resorts in that county. They were accompanied by Mrs. A. E. Vogt. Frank Buckley acted as chaffeur of their Buick two-cylinder touring car.

The Diamond Rubber Company are just in receipt of a telegram from their factory stating that their Demountable Rim had won a signal victory over all other makers at the Chicago Club contest, four wheels having been changed in five minutes, thirty-six and two-fifths seconds.

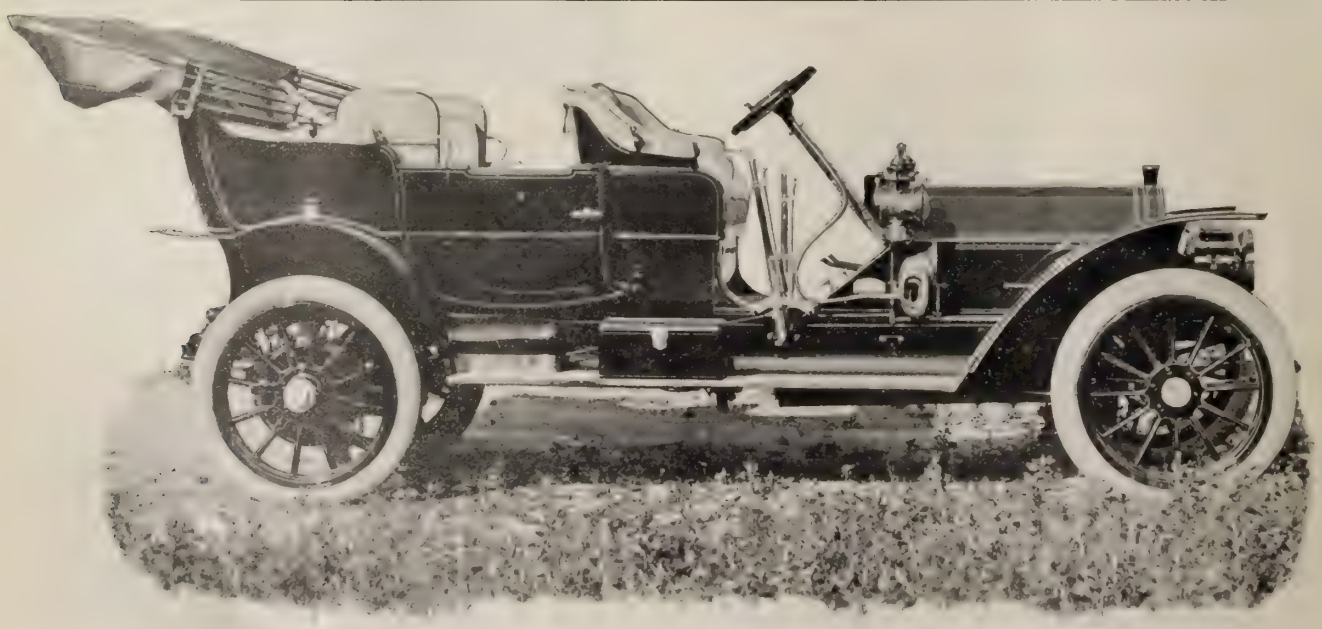
Mr. and Mrs. E. D. Mendenhall of Oakland drove from their home to the Santa Clara Valley last Friday in their Oldsmobile. They spent Saturady and Sunday visiting there and returned Monday.

The Pioneer Automobile Company report the sale of a Thomas-Detroit car to S. T. Allen, and one of the same model to Mr. Don Ray.

M. Koshland and a party of friends returned recently from a trip to Lake Tahoe. The party were away several weeks and enjoyed themselves thoroughly in their Thomas Flyer.

Mr. and Mrs. L. Barrere have returned to their home in this city after a four days trip to the hunting grounds of the Point Reyes Sportmen's Club. They made the trip in their two-cylinder Buick runabout and enjoyed a pleasant outing.

E. B. Watson, who recently arrived from Portland, Oregon, and will engage in business here which will necessitate his traveling all over California, took delivery Saturday from the Howard Automobile Company of a Buick "White Streak."



Mr. and Mrs. Frank Foote made the southern circuit of the bay last Sunday in their Thomas Forty.

The Pioneer Automobile Company report the sale of an Oldsmobile to W. W. Cox of Crows Landing. He will leave today for Santa Cruz to spend two or three weeks touring that vicinity.

Mr. C. E. Mathewson, Pacific Coast manager of the Diamond Rubber Company, has just returned from a hurried trip to Los Angeles where he went to arrange for more space and help, a great increase in their business in southern California making larger quarters an absolute necessity.

H. D. Hallett of Los Angeles, accompanied by W. T. Hoover and Walter Hopkins of Boston, are making a tour of the State in an Oldsmobile. Mr. Hallett owns several Oldsmobiles, but this particular machine is a 1907, Model A, touring car, which he has reconstructed for long journeys. The tonneau is cut off and a jump seat substituted which is placed on a large trunk in which supplies are carried. The car is also equipped with 34x4½ inch tires all around. One of these tires claims 16,000 miles to its credit. The roads between Shepherd's Bar Inn and Gaviota Pass are said to be so bad that they defy description. Otherwise the three day's trip was a comfortable one.

day. The breakfast table was accordingly loaded with flowers. The young author likewise had ordered a beautiful floral offering. She distinguished him by placing some of his flowers in her belt. On this morning, he forced himself into the most exaggerated high spirits. He played all sorts of pranks, while the merry crowd who had gathered to celebrate the lady's twenty-sixth birthday (do not let us be too accurate!) was speeding along the Corniche in a large automobile.

Towards the end of the sumptuous luncheon, which was served in the Restaurant de la Reserve at the Gulf promenade of Cannes, he brought out a sparkling toast to the health of the birthday queen, as he raised the champagne goblet.

Everybody cheered and applauded, surrounding the lady, whose mood was that of the majority of the participants. Her hands were taken possession of and covered with kisses. All at once, one of the gentlemen, who had lived for a long time in Paris, protested against this kissing of hands, claiming that a salute was the only proper and time-hallowed procedure on a festive occasion of this kind. She was obliged to submit. Everyone was privileged to salute her, according to the French example set by the ringleader, who imprinted a fleeting kiss on the powdered cheek, first to the left and then to the right of the mouth. When the writer's turn came, she pressed her lips for an instant close to his.

While coffee and liqueurs were being served, together with cigarettes, in the pavilion built out over the water, she entertained him again by raving about her new frock, the birthday surprise she had prepared for herself.

"By the time we get back, the box will have arrived. I can hardly wait to see it. You will be able to judge for yourself tonight."

"So I am not to see the masterpiece before that time?"

She deliberated and peeping rapidly to right and left, she said in a semi-whisper: "I shall be dressed by six o'clock, in time for my cup of tea. But do not come across the corridor, please, in order to avoid all gossip. It will be best for you to sit on the balcony of the reading room. My suite is next door to it. Well, we shall see."

The others were consumed with envy as they witnessed the excellent terms the couple seemed to be on. The universal mood, however, rose to more exuberant heights than ever on the way home.

When they separated on the hotel terrace in Upper Monte Carlo, the writer reminded the lady of her promise. But now she objected.

Her bejeweled hand happened to rest on the back of a chair. He felt impelled to place his own hand over it. She let him do so, trembling slightly under the pressure of his fingers, which had grown all at once as cold as ice. Then she returned the pressure of his hand, gently, almost imperceptibly. He had caught fire, as he was free to admit to himself. If there was a flaw in his triumph, it lay in the fact that his victory had been made too easy.

"I am going to promenade up and down right here, in front of the reading room, like a very good boy, between your room and mine," he said with a smile. "You will come at least as far as the door, in order to show yourself to me in the new dress—won't you?"

She nodded without speaking. Then she suddenly wheeled around and disappeared in the door of her apartment. He knew that she was expecting him.

The sun was just about to set. The western sky was flaming in fiery reds. The colors were so intense that all the windows and balconies gradually filled with spectators.

The young man likewise was charmed for a time by this wonderful play of colors. Cape Martin slowly dwindled to a pale, pinkish streak, gradually turning to lavender. A sea of light tints spread from the direction of Marseilles beyond the outposts of the Martime Alps and gradually across the entire horizon. A dark red haze lay in front of the west—a white sail came gliding past and was at once dipped in crimson. This was not water, no, it was a sea of opal and gold. From the small crests of foam, silver sparks sprayed up into the darkening air.

The ahs! and ohs! of admiration around him had subsided. He now stood alone upon the terrace; filled with a longing mixed with infinite sadness. His contemplative mood was interrupted by the porter who obsequiously brought his mail, a number of much traveled letters demanding extra postage. But there was one which bore the correct address and which he almost tore across in his haste to learn its message. He did not even take the time to step into his room, but began to read at once, although it had already become rather dark on the terrace. Everything had disappeared around him. But the beautiful sad eyes of the other woman were gazing at him from the darkness. It was as if her eyes could reach from the blue distance to the Mediterranean Gulf, and as if they were penetrating to the very depths of his soul.

"I have kept silence," she wrote, "because my battle had to be fought alone. Now at last I am free. Whether my voice is still strong enough to reach you in the midst of the social whirl of Monte Carlo, I do not know. I hope so—but my hope is nothing but a tiny, trembling flame."

The door leading into the small reception room of the temptress was still open. The lights had not yet been lit. They had even been extinguished again in the adjoining bedroom, where she had donned the new dinner gown. It was still light enough to admire the beautiful garment. The large arc lamps, which floated like full moons in the dark blue sky above the terrace, threw a magic radiance over the cozy room and the smiling woman before the mirror.

Her slender, supple bust emerged from sea green waves of airy chiffon, which formed the material of the blouse-like waist. Rippling cascades of chiffon seemed to float like a vapor over the heavy, soft silk, with many interstices bridged over by Brussels lace. The closely shirred skirt at last flowed down in extravagantly wide, soft billows, the sea green chiffon suggesting the floods from which arises the seaborn Goddess of Beauty. The broad jeweled necklace lent a proud poise to her piquant head, crowned by auburn hair, in which a small diadem was scintillating. A mysterious blamor emanated also from the silk garment. Hundreds of tiny silver tinsel ornaments flashed from the chiffon waves, irregularly scattered, as if poured out in reckless profusion. The entire woman seemed to radiate in the deepening twilight.

The temptress smilingly appeared on the threshold. The terrace was empty. No—over there, at the banisters, someone seemed to recognize her. Now he turned. But he approached the open door to the left of the reading room—his room!

She waited a while longer. It was somewhat chilly at the open door, for the nights were invariably accompanied by a marked change of temperature. A triumphant smile passed over her features. She picked up a large fur boa of costly ermine from the nearest rocker, threw it around her, and ventured out a few steps upon the terrace.

Deep silence lay all around, for the guests had all gone to their rooms, in order to dress for dinner. She heard only the rustle of her long train and of the silken skirts dragging over the marble tiles. She had passed more than once by his door, which had remained half open. She could see him moving hastily to and fro, but she did not wish to stop, because she thought he was dressing for dinner. She could hear the pulling out of bureau drawers, the pushing aside of trunks.

At last her exuberant spirits helped to drive her upon his threshold. He was bending over his trunk. When he heard the rustle of the silken skirts, he turned hasitly around.

She gave a short laugh. For an instant, she spread out her arms, so that the fur, the ends of which she was lifting at the same time, left her dress exposed. "Well?" she said, amused by his startled, not to say perturbed expression. He pushed his hair back, and looked confusedly around his room, with all the open trunks and boxes and cupboards. The gravity expressed in his features froze the smile upon her lips. She suddenly caught sight of the traveling bag upon the table.

"What is the matter? Are you getting packed?"

"I am. I am obliged to leave tonight."

"But that is—that is—more than peculiar."

"Yes. I have received news which concerns me—nay, moved me so deeply that—"

The fur had been dropped back over her seductive array.

"Indeed?" she said almost soundlessly. "News, you say. Of a business character, I presume?"

Her aspect, her insistence, hurt him.

"No," he said shortly, after a brief, mute struggle with himself. "It is only a personal matter. But it is a call which I must and will obey."

His strange and freezing accents struck her like a cold shower. She could not forgive herself for remaining even another second. At the same time, her rising anger rendered her incapable for the moment of ending the scene. In helpless fury, she kept clasping and unclasping the tips of her fur boa.

"That is indeed more than peculiar!" she at last repeated half to herself. Suddenly she covered her eyes with her hands, turned abruptly, and hurried away past the reading room, back to her apartment. The rustle of silk died away. Impetuous weeping, like that of a spoiled child, became faintly audible in the distance, immediately followed by the violent slamming of a door.

The man was keenly alive to the fact that he had mortally offended the pretty woman. But he had not time to ponder over the matter. She belonged to another world, so infinitely remote from the world that suddenly claimed him again as its own!

The Riviera express was to leave in an hour. He was obliged to finish his packing in a desperate hurry—to see her again—the other woman!

Send an Automobile by Parcels' Post

Attention was recently called to a somewhat remarkable feat on the part of the European post office officials in sending an automobile from France to England parcels' post. Mandeville Hall, a young New Yorker, was hurrying from Paris to London, in order, he said, to be present at the Olympic games. He reached Calais too late to catch the regular boat and the next one did not carry freight nor baggage. So he decided to send the machine across by mail and it was duly weighed and stamped and delivered to Mr. Hall safely by the postal authorities at Dover. Later, however, Hall was arrested at the instance of the French authorities, who demanded his extradition for the alleged theft of the automobile from Henry Fournier, of Paris.

Edgar C. Humphrey and family of Burlingame spent their week-end vacation touring Marin and Sonoma counties in their two-cylinder Buick touring car.

enue ordered that "In future cocktails put up in bottles for medicinal, fraternal or picnic use, are to be taxed and stamped!"

"Shades of old Peter Stuyvesant and Colonel Carter of Cartersville! A cocktail—that delicious concoction that enables the palate to appreciate all the delights of a succession of dishes—to be treated as though it were of no more value to a man's enjoyment than a bottle of patent medicine or a flask of "Ben" Tillman's South Carolina dispensary whisky! That this attempt to throttle the "cocktail habit," so far as consumption is concerned should prove a failure was a foregone conclusion. The cocktail will be a power in the land when the name of the man who attempted to tax and stamp it will have long since been forgotten.

Thirty years ago an American cocktail could not be procured in all Europe. Gradually afterward decoctions that would make a cat sick could be procured at the Criterion or Alhambra, the Langham or the Victoria, in London; the Grand and the Continental, the Cafe de Paix and Cafe de Paris, in Paris, and at the Cafe de Paris in Monte Carlo. But at present the American cocktail—good, bad or indifferent, generally bad—may be obtained all over the world. In the very shadow of Cheops and the Sphinx there is a barroom, with the sign "American Cocktails" over the door. Just at the outer gate of Pompeii is an inn and over the bar are the words "American Cocktails." Away up the Nile at Assouan I was informed by my dragoman where I could buy the New York Herald and get an American cocktail. The conductors on the train between Joppa and Jerusalem will point out at the same moment where Stephen was stoned to death and where could be obtained an American cocktail. At the leading hotels in Vienna, Berlin, Budapest, Constantinople, Athens, Cairo, Luxor, Madrid and Seville a sort of an American cocktail may be procured. But, my God! no more to be compared to the nectareous offerings of a San Francisco or Los Angeles barkeeper than the muddy waters of the Mississippi can be compared to the pellucid depths of Lake Tahoe. But there is one place in Paris where a perfect Martini or Manhattan may be obtained—I mean at "Henry's."

TAMED AT THE TABLE.

By John O'Keefe.

At breakfast in our little flat
Our words ran hot and high.
The canteloupe was green, and that
Was shadowed in her eye.
The bitter butter touched her tongue,
Which leaped decorum's bounds.
If I cold looks in answer flung,
The coffee gave me grounds.

At luncheon it was worse by far.
The white wine, sharp and sour,
Produced much verbal vinegar
In that unhappy hour.
The ragout put us in a stew,
And, as a thing of course,
When I the duckling cut in two
I pondered on divorce.

But dinner! Ah! the most serene
Peacemakers are the cooks.
The vapor from the turtle green
Steamed out our hardened looks;
Succeeding dishes added spice;
Stomachic bliss we felt;
And when our hands clasped o'er the ice,
You should have seen it melt!

Ah! love may languish in the morn
When muffins make him moan;
At 2 p. m. hurt hearts may scorn
The finest luncheon known;
But when the red-robed candles gloat
O'er wine more red to see,
Then Cupid dons a dinner-coat,
And waits on you and me.

DIFFERENCE OF OPINION.

He—I love you.
She—I love you.
Her Mother—I can turn up my nose at Mrs. Johnnie-Tucker now.

The Maid of Honor—I always thought she would get some man of his type.
The Best Man—He's too good for her.
The Minister—Thank you.
His Former Flame—I could have had him.
The Other Debutantes—How did she ever get him. She isn't pretty, hasn't a cent, and doesn't know how to dress.

Letters

New Edition Demanded

The new edition of "A Green Carnation," that clever satire on the peculiarities of a certain prominent literary set of London, will be none the less well received because of the identity of some of the characters. The "Elderly Gentlemen" is drawn from the Marquis of Queensbury; "Reggie" is Lord Alfred Douglas; "Mr. Amarinth" is Oscar Wilde; "The Second Marchioness of Hedfield" is the Marquis of Queensbury's second wife; "Madame Valtesi" is Mrs. Gabriel; "A Certain Actor" is Sir Charles Wyndham; "Your Brother" is Willie Wilde; "The Soul of Bertie Brown" refers to Oscar Wilde's novel, "The Picture of Dorian Gray," and "A Theatre" is the Criterion. The book, which was Mr. Hichens' first, enjoyed a sensational run. It was widely attributed to Oscar Wilde at the time, and that alone would have attracted attention to it. It has been long out of print, but in the meantime the reputation of Robert Hichens has grown so rapidly that almost anything from his pen is reasonably certain to become a best seller as soon as offered. Years ago Mr. Hichens was the editor and owner of a weekly newspaper called "Mistress and Maid," which was designed to be the organ of domestic servants. The tastes of the butler and the cook, the parlor maid and the footman were all appealed to and no doubt, taking into consideration the personality of the editor, they were reveling in better literature than their superiors enjoyed.

New Books by Californian Authors

Eleanor Gates has a new novel ready for publication. Indeed there are few of the local celebrities whose names will not appear in the fall catalogues. Gertrude Atherton has her new book ready for press; Kate Douglas Wiggin has just returned from her annual European visit, ready likewise; Gellett Burgess is in France assiduously making hay; Wallace Irwin's "Letters of a Japanese Schoolboy" will be an early fall book. It is time that Geraldine Bonner came to us again. Society with the capital "S" is, of course, on the verge of surprising us once more with the perfections of the untrained amateur, and despite the wails of the publishing world over the hard times, there will be no dearth of the usual output of volumes, good, bad and indifferent. Frank Norris once said, "At a conservative estimate there are seventy million people in the United States. At a liberal estimate, one hundred thousand of these have lost the use of both arms; remain then, sixty-nine million, nine hundred thousand who write novels. Indeed, many are called, but few —or, what a scanty, skimped handful that few represent—are chosen!"

A Children's Story for Grown-Ups

Josephine Daskam Bacon assuredly knows children of all ages and both sexes from A to Izzard, and if the adult generation had the wit to understand that her stories about children were not meant for children, they might imbibe much wisdom therefrom. Her recent volume, "Ten to Seventeen," concerns itself with the doings of a fashionable boarding academy where the ages of the inmates range between those ages. It is thrown into the form of a diary kept by one of the younger children and intended to be secretly buried with appropriate ceremonies, to be resurrected in some future age of the planet, and thus to furnish a true, historical record of the important events affecting the Elmbank students. The little girls are, naturally, only onlookers and imitators of the elders, but they have individuality and character. "Connie," otherwise Constantia Van Cott, is a priggish little mortal who, even in her tender years, plays the part of missionary and reformer—and she writes poems—dear, delicious little poems, all of which end up in the same fashion with references to "beyond the tombs." Benigna, otherwise Ben, is as practical and resourceful as Connie is morbidly priggish. Roberta, the scribe of the coterie, is philosophically matter of fact, and the three children unconsciously lend their aid to Dr. Welles, who is charged with the bodily well-being of the school, by their comments on the vagaries and fads which affect the pupils. Elmbank is probably a typical institution of its kind, attended by daughters of the well-to-do whose mothers have no time to devote to them. Though the girls are neither wild nor unruly their teachers have enough occupation heading off the restless little atoms in their adventurous sallies, and counteracting the effects of their innocent, if impertinent meddling. Grown-ups and those who have passed the period of early youth will enjoy and appreciate "Ten to Seventeen." Children in their early teens, who are still too near the same point of view as the three principal participants, will be as unable to comprehend the humor. Published by Harper and Brothers.

A Tale of the Merry Monarch

Some captious critic has complained that the Castles can never stray far from "Prince Charlie" but as long as they give us stirring good stories, why should any one object? "My Merry Rockhurst" takes us back to the time of the merry monarch, first during the dark days of his exile, when the wherewithal for the next meal was not even a problem, and after the restoration, to England where the extravagant lavishness would seem to have left not even a memory of other times. "Rockhurst," the faithful friend of the exiled

The FASHIONABLE PRIVATE ADDRESS DIRECTORY

Now being compiled and reservations made for season of 1908-09

Special Features being the names, addresses, reception days, and country residences, with private telephone numbers arranged alphabetically for reference.

The San Francisco List is classified in the residential districts, by blocks, streets, and numbers, with occupants' names, giving odd numbers in left column, and even in right —making it an invaluable guide for social purposes and an easy reference for the commercial and professional community.

The List of Automobile Owners contains 18,000 Names and Registered Addresses. Clubs and Societies, giving the Officers and Members with Addresses. Revised Street and Avenue Guide. Permanent Guests at the Leading Hotels. Banking, Insurance, Real Estate and Professional Men. Personnel of the Press. Theatre Diagrams, Ladies' Shopping Guide, etc. etc.

The utmost care will be used this year in revision and compilation to make the work complete and accurate. Address all communications to CHAS. C. HOAG, Publisher, 313 Battery St., San Francisco. Phone Douglas 636 prince, was anything but merry, the sobriety and solemnity of his countenance alone having provoked the designation. Along with the usual pictures of damsels of easy virtue and dames of none at all, and the ups and downs of the fortunes of court gallants there is a graphic presentation of the plague years, the horrible levity that went side by side with the insane fear, and the separation of friends and families, some to be reunited under most dramatic circumstances, others never to meet again. There is a singularly involved love story in which both father and son are entangled, and an unraveling of the knotted cord. "My Merry Rockhurst" is a historical novel in the sense that it helps to make a background for the history of the period and to fix the picture of the careless profligacy of the court as contrasted with the peaceful quiet of rural life and the squalid misery of the poor in London. The Macmillan Company are its sponsors.

Demand for Lafcadio Hearn's Works

One result of Dr. Gould's unprovoked attack on the memory and reputation of the late Lafcadio Hearn is to cause an increased demand for his books. The Harpers are resurrecting his "Two Years in the French West Indies," and will probably follow it with other reprints, while the number of reviewers who, according to their own confession, are just discovering "Japan," and other of his more recent books speaks volumes for the influence of the "best-sellers." However, better late than never. No doubt many of the newly interested are misled by newspaper discussions and expect to find material salacious enough to appeal to a jaded palate, in which they are doomed to sad disappointment. The inscription over the doorway of an ancient Rhenish inn is as applicable to books as to other hospitality: "Man takes not hence what he brings not here."

SUMMONS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA, IN AND FOR THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO.

No. 16,863. Department No. 10.

SOPHIE C. OLSEN, Plaintiff,

vs.

OSCAR J. OLSEN, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIfornia, send greeting to Oscar J. Olsen, Defendant.

YOU ARE HEREBY REQUIRED to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, on the ground of defendant's willful desertion and willful neglect, also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

GIVEN under my hand and the Seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 28th day of May, A. D. 1908.

1909 Four-Cylinder

STEVENS-DURYEA

Model X

In bringing out this new model we do not in any way retract any claims that we have made for the six-cylinder car, which we are firmly convinced is the highest type of automobile construction.. In response to a demand for a larger and roomier car than our twenty-horse-power, four-cylinder Model R, and more moderate in price than our Light Six, we have produced the Model X. This model supplies a demand for a four-cylinder car a little larger and more powerful than the Model R, which has been discontinued. The owner of the Model X can feel that the well-known features of the Model R are embodied in his car, together with the advantages of more room and power. In brief, the Model X is an enlargement and refinement of the Model R, representing the most advanced ideas in automobile designs, together with Stevens-Duryea construction and workmanship, which have been proven absolutely correct.

THREE-POINT SUPPORT

This construction, which has made the name "Stevens-Duryea" synonymous with motor car efficiency, is retained. Stevens-Duryea cars were built on correct principles in the beginning, and at no time have any radical changes been made in their design.

The Truth Comes After Death

Now that Senator Allison is in his grave it is interesting and instructive to ponder the testimony that has been offered since his death with reference to his high character and devotion to duty. For from this testimony we learn how undeserving of credence are many of the disparaging reports concerning statesmen which are diffused by the conscienceless muckrakers of journalism and politics. In recent years Allison was abused and villified almost as much as any other member of the Upper House, but since his death we have been informed even by the most bitter of his calumniators that he was an upright, conscientious statesman, and that he was devoted to the best interests of the country. By nobody was Allison more bitterly vituperated than by his political rival, Governor Cummins of Iowa, but that gentleman having had his envy assuaged by the death of the man whose seat in the Senate he coveted, rushed into print with a choice collection of fine eulogiums of the deceased. William H. Taft tells us that in the death of Senator Allison the country has lost a great public servant, one whom he loved and whom he consulted "as a son would a father." William Bryan with his characteristic passion for utterance and indifference to truth tells us that Allison "has enjoyed the confidence of the country regardless of party." Allison did not enjoy the confidence of the country at all. The country has been repeatedly told by the muckrakers that Allison was one of the coterie of Senators that managed the Senate in the interests of the great robbers of the people, and such is the damnable power of iteration and the popular predisposition to whatever is offered in disparagement of the exalted, that they were believed. It is because of Senators of the Allison type, men who scorn the arts of the demagogue and are guided by the fundamental principles of government, that political agitators who preach the desirability of abandoning the constitutional mode of electing members of the Upper House, have made many converts to their propaganda. The Allisons of the Senate, whose self-respect restrains them from the expedients by which a La Follette charms the imagination of the multitude, have supplied the demagogues with their most effective ammunition.

How Vice Is Disciplined

Says the Rev. Father Carraher, speaking of conditions in San Francisco: "Crime was never so rampant nor morality at a lower ebb than at present." And further: "Chief Dinan and Abe Ruef were indicted for opening and keeping open 714 Pacific street. Mr. Biggy openly sanctioned the running of that place as an immoral institution, the very thing for which the other men were indicted." And again: "This district that Mr. Biggy has established here is the stronghold of criminals, the stronghold of thieves, assassins and thugs, from which they sally forth to waylay, rob and murder." Father Carraher speaks the truth. He is guilty of no exaggeration. Nay, he has but faintly outlined the true state of affairs. San Francisco, so far as life in the shadows is concerned, in all that pertains to the affairs of the outcasts of society, is in a far more deplorable condition than it was during the regime of Schmitz and Ruef. Under the guise of regulation certain forms of vice are receiving from the good, chaste old gentleman who imagines that he is running the city government, the same encouragement that was given when Eugene Schmitz was in power. But there is a great difference in the aspect of affairs. The holy-rollers of the Spreckels' dispensation have, perhaps in their misguided zeal for morality, made vice seem far more frightful than ever before. For now the quintessence of it is exposed in one district as in a market place. Here it is endured, pitied by some, by others embraced. In no other city of America is there such a frank, revolting exhibition of vice. We have heard it advanced as a theory of enlightened sociologists that the vice which must be endured should be isolated; that it should not be permitted the freedom of the city—to flaunt itself broadcast and spread contamination. There is much to be said for this theory. And here we have one of the principles of it undergoing a practical test. While there has been no attempt to reduce the size of the theatre of vice, the lupanars of the lowest grade are restricted to a certain area, and these are open to the public. The scene of degradation which they present is at once hideous and piteous. Nothing approximating it can be found anywhere in the world. One might imagine an analogy to be found in a slave market of the Orient. Here are human chattels waiting to be chosen in a large hall through which passes a stream of humanity; poor, shameless creatures on exhibition, in charge of an overseer, and compelled to observe certain rules of decorum that bring out their degradation in grostesque relief. This system may realize the Christian idea of safeguarding the world against contamination, but nevertheless it presents a terrible spectacle, one that is instinct with cruelty and brutality. And this spectacle, under the divine dispensation of the Hon. E. Robeson Taylor, has become one of the popular "sights" of San Francisco. Tourists from all quarters of the globe flock to the lupanars to see how vice is made hideous in the metropolis of the West. Small boys mingle in the procession of onlookers. And all the while perfect decorum is maintained. The system is in perfect working order, and Chief Biggy is proud of his achievement.

A Scientist Believes in Spirits

The principal reason advanced by science for its refusal to regard the Bible as anything more than a combination of history and legend is that miracles are mentioned therein. Science is convinced that the laws of nature cannot be suspended, and therefore it takes no stock in miracles. M. Renan having greater faith in science than in religion refused to accept the gospel accounts of many of the incidents in the life of Christ and flouted the whole Messianic dogma. But now we find that Science is beginning to recede from its position. That eminent British Scientist, Sir Oliver Lodge, declares it to be his opinion that a good case has been made out for accepting the possibility of lucid moments of intercourse with departed spirits. Apparently this is a step in the direction of the supernatural. If it once be established that intercourse with departed spirits is possible who will be able to say with any degree of authority that any kind of miraculous power is impossible? Sir Oliver Lodge tells us that for twenty years members of the Psychical Research Society have been holding back "excellent evidence" of chats with the dead, on the bare possibility of explaining the matter some other way. "Definite and crucial" tests have been made, and the evidence is soon to be given to the world. When we come to examine the method of communication as described by Sir Oliver we find that it virtually involves resurrection of the dead. For he tells us the medium of communication is a person whose spirit and body become "dislocated"; that is to say, the spirit retires and leaves the body to itself, like a typewriter whose operator has gone home. While the body is in this unoccupied condition, some roaming spirit detects the deserted instrument and eagerly takes possession and "makes use of it to achieve some desired influence on the physical world." After conveying some message the vagrant spirit departs and the spirit that has a vested interest in the body returns and resumes possession. Is this not very much like resurrection of the dead? Any way it implies the existence of a marvellous force that is beyond the ken of scientists. Nobody knows what the potentialities of this force may be. But until we get more definite information from Sir Oliver Lodge it is idle to speculate on the subject. Meanwhile the revelation to be made will doubtless be awaited with eager expectancy by the religious world.

They Must Mend Their Manners

Very entertaining has been the behaviour of the repudiated reformers since the primary election; and characterized by the variety of a vaudeville performance. Some have bared their emotions and others have studiously dissembled; some have taken their medicine without a grimace, and others have snarled and exhibited their fangs in the old, familiar way, but most of them, partial to misrepresentation as usual, have juggled the returns to make the overwhelming defeat appear to be only a set-back instead of a rout. But as the lust of our reformers is of the sadistic variety, inasmuch as ecstasy is impossible unless their passion is gratified through the medium of pain, this distortion of the facts involving no injury to anybody, is not at all satisfying. It is but a makeshift, adopted on the principle of any port in a storm. Far more creditable to the reformers is their naive display of courage and confidence and their affectation of resolute perseverance. Crushed and humiliated, they affirm their intention of keeping unfurled the banner of reform and waging the fight for freedom until the railroad forces are driven out of the political field and the octopus has received its everlasting quietus. This is the stern spirit we love. We like to see men with spirit ever willing and flesh never weak—gluttons for punishment, as it were. No good work can be accomplished without encountering difficulties and surmounting obstacles and putting forth the qualities of energy and perseverance. In the sentiment that inspires the bold resolution of these reformers of hot blood and abounding vigor, these "glad souls without reproach or blot," we heartily concur. The redemption of California from railroad domination is a consummation to which we have been looking forward for many years, and for its achievement we would not scruple at becoming—even a reformer, providing the company were not too good. The mere novelty of being in a popular fight is in itself to a journal that is always apparently fighting the people in their own interest, a powerful inducement. We believe that if sufficiently persevering the reformers will be able to exterminate the octopus, but not if experience has failed to bring wisdom to aid the operations of dulled sensibility. The condition precedent to triumph in our opinion is that the reformers shall cease to arrogate to themselves all the virtue available in these parts. If they have not learned that a superfetation of virtue is fatal then they have accumulated experience in vain. The evil that a monopoly of virtue with the inevitable consciousness of it entails is this: it makes men arrogant, hypercritical and offensive. Our reformers have been positively insufferable in their ostentatious rectitude. There is not the slightest likelihood of their accomplishing anything as reformers while insisting that they are the source and centre of all the good in the world. It is in this state of mind that men are inclined to utter themselves in derogation of others; and thus they provoke resentment which leads to retorts and embitters controversy. To become successful politicians our reformers must first learn that they are only fallible and blundering mortals like the rest of us. They must quit holding themselves out as:

> Salt of the earth, the virtuous few
> Who season mankind.

Vanity is a pardonable weakness, but when blended with a contumelious spirit it is one of the worst of vices. We have witnessed its mischievous effects upon our heady reformers. Bent alike on enforcing their own views and crushing their opponents by all the resources of wealth and of a political despotism which they have perfected in the heart of an American commonwealth, their arrogance provoked universal disgust, and when repulsed, in their fury and frenzy they behaved at one moment like pole-cats and at another like wild horses biting those before them and kicking those behind them. Let us hope the reformers have profited from experience and are now disposed to mend their manners.

Dramatist and Playwright

Speaking of the death of Mr. Bronson Howard the New York Post says he "bore the courtesy title of the leading American dramatist, when he should have been described more properly as the leading playwright of America." If Mr. Bronson Howard was the leading American playwright but not the leading American dramatist to whom does the title of leading American dramatist belong? We suspect that in this matter the Post is drawing a purely academic and priggishly highbrow distinction. At the same time it occurs to us that the distinction has been improperly drawn. A writer may be dramatic without adopting the dramatic form, as was Browning in his monologues, but it can be hardly said that having written monologues abounding in dramatic interest Browning was a dramatist. When we speak of a dramatist we mean a playwright, one who writes plays, and no monologue however powerful in its appeal to the emotions can be so eminently dramatic as a play which expresses ideas through a perfectly successful use of the conditions of the stage and deals with life through the medium chosen for expression. If, therefore, Bronson Howard was a great playwright, he was also a great dramatist; but he was neither. We have no great dramatists and one of the reasons is that we have no great critics. It will be said that the great Greek dramatists flourished in advance of the great Greek critics, and that the critics learned the rules of the art from the dramatists, but while this is true it does not refute what we have said. The great Greek dramatists, in addition to being heaven-born geniuses, were men of culture, and they lived in a strong current of ideas and in a period of intellectual growth. Behind or in all the subsequent creative epochs of literature was a great critical effort. When the influence of sound criticism is not felt the mediocrities of literature flourish, and even men of ability have little conscience in intellectual matters. "The less a literature," says Matthew Arnold, "has felt the influence of a supposed centre of correct information, correct judgment, correct taste, the more we shall find in it the note of provinciality." There is no such centre in this country, and as a consequence theatrical claptrap is profitable, and when a play of the character of "TheGreat Divide" comes along the critics are moved by it, and instead of seeking above all to learn whether they were right in permitting themselves to be moved, they pronounce it "a notable production." Some have even pronounced it "The Great American Drama." Yet here is a play built on an unsound basis and one in which the fundamental human probabilities are not observed, a play constructed entirely with a view to effectiveness—of superficial effectiveness on the stage, but not according to the logic of human nature. There is very little serious dramatic criticism in this country. Occasionally an intellectual person, such as the New York Post's editorial writer ventures to illuminate the subject of the dramatic art, and then we are edified thus: "For all his sharpness of observation and his later capacity for satire, he was a story-teller, rather than a dramatist. His plays dependent upon a foundation of preordained incidents were essentially conventional in structure. They never grew out of the everlasting conflict between circumstance and character, and seldom touched upon any of the graver racial or social problems demanding a comprehensive outlook and philosophic insight." Now what does all this mean? Is satire essential to drama? Was there ever a dramatist who was not a story-teller? Can a writer be dramatic without telling a story? If preordained incidents are fatal to drama, how about the Greek classics that deal entirely with predistined persons? If dramas should not be convential in structure why should there be a technique of the drama? If Bronson Howard was not a great dramatist (and he wasn't) it was not for any of the reasons given in the Post. As a matter of fact his plays grew out of nothing else but the everlasting conflict between circumstance and character. Plays that do not grow out of such conflict are not playable. And as for their dramatic qualities, anything which represents divers persons conversing together in such a manner as to rouse anxiety with respect to the result is dramatic. Even the dialogues of Plato are of a dramatic nature. The simple truth is that Bronson Howard's plays are not great because he brought the most elementary of moral and physical conflicts on the stage, and because the persons in whose feelings, desires and actions he made perceptible the incidents of his story were the most obvious of stage puppets.

Women In Clubdom

A London woman's club squabble which has found its way into court for adjustment has brought forward the old question: Are women clubable? with a discussion which would seem to mass the weight of evidence on the negative side. Few women are able to put aside their personal and family prejudices. It is hard for the sex to grasp the fundamental fact of collective ownership and equal rights. Each woman regards the club house as her own private domain to be conducted with due respect to her personal idiosyncracies. Anything that she individually finds annoying or uncongenial must straightway be abolished. And women with few exceptions are "cliquey." Just as soon as one develops a prejudice, it may be against some color scheme or style of furnishing, or it may be against something more important or infinitely trivial, she at once seeks out others who either are already semi-inclined in the same direction, or who can be easily influenced, and straightway there are factions formed. The club squabble is often the rock upon which engagements are broken and marriages wrecked. Elaborate club houses are becoming more and more simply private restaurants where the women drop in for tea or for cards. It has been found impossible to establish a code of etiquette or manners, and the whole scheme is so new there are no traditions for guidance. Every woman is a law unto herself and an ever-changing law, and who dare say her nay? The root of the fatal irreconcilability between women and club life is in the congenital inconsiderateness of the sex. And this is a fatal perversity not to be easily eradicated. We do not agree with Dryden who says, "To so perverse a sex all grace is vain," but we are not disposed to grant that the sex will ever be able to ornament behaviour with the graces essential to harmonious existence in clubdom.

Perspective Impressions

Nothing is so astonishing to some men as the success of others.

The idea of expecting Judge Lawlor to find Gumshoe Burns guilty of contempt of court!

In estimating the expenses of the campaign several candidates have failed to hand in the cost of their own funerals.

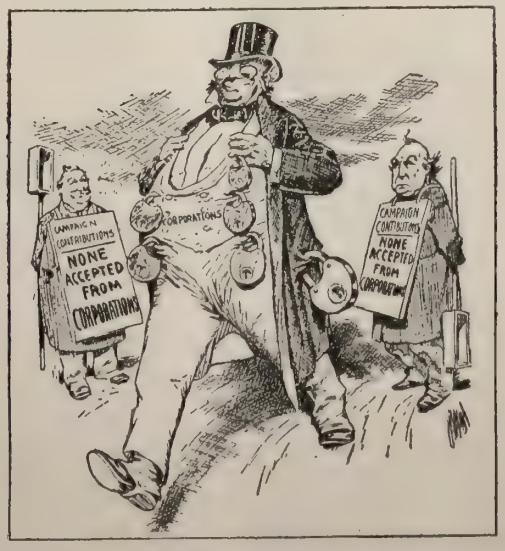
Mascagni was recently pelted with onions in an opera house in Florence, but as he probably had been eating garlic he was doubtless strong enough for the ordeal.

Adlai Stevenson who is running for Governor of Illinois enjoys the distinction of being the oldest job-chaser in America.

Editor Older who pointed the way to the homes of the judges of the Court of Appeal in the hope that a crazy mob would take his dastardly hint and commit a foul murder, is now wondering why the people aren't holding indignation meeting to express their rage against the villains who, it is said, marked him for slaughter.

"He confessed without promise of immunity," says Detective Burns. Wasn't something similar said with reference to Ruef?

Those classics—Mayor Taylor's appeal to the voters and Livernash's epistles to his faithless disciples of organized labor—ought to be preserved between book covers for future reference.



The overshadowing question of the day says Bryan, is "Shall the people rule?" The answer is, Not very long if they continue to put demagogues of the Bryan-Roosevelt type into office.

According to Bryan in his speech of acceptance, God's laws have been annuled by cunning politicians, and therefore the people should elect the Democratic standard bearer to have things straightened out.

The clergy of the Methodist Church have announced their intention of pledging Congressmen to vote against Speaker Cannon because he is opposed to a silly prohibition measure which, if passed, would be pronounced unconstitutional. The liquor interests will probably take notice of the Congressmen who take the pledge.

The Street Singer

By Rene Morax

At a sign from the Baron von Axius, the silent waiters disappeared. The rippling laughter of women mingled with the voices of men. The white orchids on the table were dying in the heat of the candles. The tapping of a knife against a glass suddenly stopped the conversation. Hamburg, the musical critic, had risen. With his athletic figure he seemed to dominate this assembly of artists and financiers. "Allow me," he said, "to express once more our affectionate gratitude to the generous patron of arts and artists. Mycenas was a mere child compared with him. Let us drink to our host, the high-born and excellent Baron von Axius."

"Hochs!" resounded amid the clinking of glasses. The old man smiled calmly, and his fan-like white beard trembled on the expanse of his shirt front. He turned toward his neighbor and, pointing to an empty glass, said jovially: "You will bring me bad luck, fair Thecla. Is this some religious vow?"

"No, my dear friend," she replied very simply, "it is a promise I made myself long ago and that I have kept."

Again Hamburg tapped his glass. "The divine Thecla is going to tell us the secret of her abstinence," he said.

"Yes, yes!" cried the merry voices. "The secret!"

The singer, visibly embarrassed, shook her head. "No, no," she said. "Do not ask me to call up a phantom of the past in the midst of all this revelry." The silver knives of the guests beat rythmically on the gilded dishes.

"The phantom! Let us have the phantom!" they cried. The singer laughingly pressed her hands over her ears; then she raised her hand, and the tumult was silenced.

"It is a very ordinary story," she said, "there is nothing romantic about it. It is the simple truth, and reality is dreadfully tiresome." The baron had leaned toward the young woman, whose strong throat, encircled by a triple row of pearls, rose like a white gladiolis from her filmy black gown; silver spangles shone in the folds of the light material like illuminated fountains. "We shall not be able to do without your story," he said with his irresistible courtesy. "Your exordium was admirable."

"I suppose I must be resigned. But you must promise not to reproach me when I have finished. I was young then—it was many years ago. I was then a simple chorus girl. My parents, who possessed a small property, had made great sacrifices in order that I might continue my musical studies in Berlin. I rented a room in a big house on the Lutzowstrasse. I can see the shabby furniture now, covered with a flowered creton, the knitted cloth on the table, the piano in one corner covered with scores and parts. On a shelf, between two photographs there was a dusty bust of Beethoven. Who does not know the room of our youthful days, with its dirty and faded wall-paper, in which we had such delicious dreams and high ideals? My two windows looked out on a court. The light that filtered into it was cold and gray, like that at the bottom of a well, for it had to descend along five high stories. Opposite my lodging there were leprous spots of saltpeter on the wall; the hideous stains disgusted me like birthmarks on a face. An entire population of small employees, working people and soldiers, led a disordered and noisy life there. Pardon me if I dwell upon this, but I suffered as much from that court, almost as if it were a personal shame. In my hours of discouragement it seemed to be the very image of my mediocrity. But I was ambitious and I worked hard. I saw a great deal of a fantastic and scatter-brained young fellow there, Franz Pollnitz, who, like me, came from Silesia. Oh, you need not smile. We were very poor and very good. Pollnitz had a great deal of originality which he frittered away in schemes and theories. He was sure that he was a great genius, but he at least had an excellent heart. He predicted a glorious future for others as well as for himself."

"Is he dead?" asked Tiny.

"No, he married a very domestic little woman, and now he manages to eke out an existence by giving piano lessons at Frankfort." Then resuming her story: "It was one of these dark December afternoons when Berliners light their lamps at two o'clock. I was feeling sad enough to cry. It had been snowing all night. Never had I felt so thoroughly alone, so impotent before life. I had just written to my mother, I was so utterly discouraged that I longed for death with all the ardor of my eighteen years. Fortunately at that moment Pollnitz came in to ask my charity. His wood-box was empty, and his pocketbook even more so. His energy at once drove away my sadness. In a moment we were in a corner by the fire, building a thousand fairy palaces, dreaming of fabulous tours, imagining halls filled with light and applause and great audiences intoxicated with our art and our fame. Ah, what a dizzy thing is the glory that we dream of! Such an abyss separates it from reality."

She was silent for a moment. The voice of the famous singer had taken on an accent of such sincere melancholy that they respected her silence.

"We were so happy," she resumed. "Suddenly a cracked voice rose from the bottom of the court in thin 'arpeggios,' like the clicking together of little bones. It was the harp-player 'What can that spectral voice be?' cried Pollnitz. Before I could stop him he had opened the window. Like some wild beast shut up in a trench, an old woman was trudging through the snow between the black walls with their obstinately closed windows. With her head down, she was singing a wretched romance. Oh, what a hoarse and horrible voice she had!—one of those voices ravaged by drink, in which two or three notes still bloomed like pale violets on a refuse heap. That phantom of a voice, accompanied by that phantom of a harp, moved one at the same time to laughter and tears. Pollnitz burst out laughing. Then the old woman lifted her face to us, and his laughter suddenly ceased.

"Sometimes in my dreams I see again that hideous face, crushed by care and misery. Through an ugliness that had been accentuated by age and distress, there still lived a certain tragic beauty.

"'What a monster!' exclaimed Pollnitz. 'Does she come often?'

"'No, only rarely. The porter says that she has had her hour of celebrity. She used to sing at the court in days gone by, before the Emperor.'

"'A court singer!' he exclaimed laughing. 'What a ruin!'

"'Drink has done that.'

"Pollnitz threw his last pfennigs to the poor old woman. She bent down and scratched for them in the snow. To testify her gratitude she sang a piteous little love song. The windows all about flew open! 'Enough, enough!' they cried from all sides.

"Women and soldiers appeared at the casements. Then one of the soldiers conceived a brilliant idea. He gathered together on the ledge of his window a lot of newly fallen snow and dropped it on the harp. Its strings vibrated in a funny way. I confess to my shame that Pollnitz laughed, and I too. In fact a shout of laughter went up from all the windows. This was the signal for the attack. From all sides snow-balls rained upon the unhappy woman, amid coarse jokes and derisive calls. The poor old woman shook her fist. She proudly raised her head, her mouth poured forth curses. A handful of snow, thrown from one of the upper windows and thrown hard, struck her on the cheek. She tottered, and

Race of the Nations for the Successful Airship

By Graham Stern

Aerial navigation is no longer a fantastic dream. This year, according to competent inventors, saw the problem enter on a period of practical and definite results. The dirigible balloons, the aeroplanes and the aerodromes of today far surpass anything ever before achieved in aerial navigation. In vessels "heavier than air" Delagrange of France beat the world's aeroplane record by flying nearly eight miles and remaining in the air fifteen minutes and twenty-eight seconds. Henry Farman of Scotland, during a dead calm, covered 4,033 feet in his aeroplane with two men on board. Wilbur and Orville Wright, who claim to have made sensational flights in secret trials, declare they have flown a distance of 24 miles against the wind and at a speed of 40 miles an hour. There is a distinction between the Wright experiments and those of the successful French inventors: the Wrights keep most of their improvements a secret while the latter make no mystery of either their inventions or their flights. Count Zeppelin has thoroughly demonstrated the practicability of his "rigid" system and has kept his dirigible balloon in the air under complete control and against strong wind currents, carrying fourteen passengers the while, for nearly 20 hours.

One point is significant in this race of the nations to achieve the goal of successful aerial navigation; all of them are working along lines in which they hope to add airships as a potential arm to their military power. Just now Germany, with the Zeppelin airship, seems to be in the lead on the points of control, endurance and serviceability.

In this country the government has just bought Baldwin's new dirigible balloon with a view to having several others built on similar lines for the War Department. Plans are being pressed also to establish a large government experimental station in which the latest discoveries in aerial navigation may be carefully studied with a view to their adoption for usage in war. The utilitarian side of these new air vessels for commercial purposes has hardly been considered. The most encouraging sign in this direction is the attention being directed to ballooning as a new and enjoyable sport. One has only to recall what Santos Dumont and men of his kind have done in the past few years to advance the sport of ballooning to realize what amateurs may accomplish. Almost from the date of the construction of the first crude balloon the idea dominating inventors and those backing them was to construct a machine to win the supremacy of the air for martial purposes. When Giroud Villette, an able man of his day, made an accession more than a century ago in a captive Montgolfier, a developed parachute filled with heated air, he returned to earth firmly impressed with one idea—that the nation possessing a successful air machine would have a tremendous advantage over a poorer equipped enemy. That was in the time of short range guns, before Bonaparte overran Europe. Conditions have changed immensely since then but the impulse is working along the same lines. In that early period of ballooning the "military" idea was zealously followed without producing any more tangible results that the easier handling of drifting gas bags and a better acquaintance with aerial currents. During the second half of the last century the gradual changing conditions of warfare brought about several modifications in air vessels. Simple gas balloons were used by the French in Italy, by the northern States of America in 1861, the Austrians in 1866 and the French and Germans in 1870.

Modern ballooning was given its first great impetus during the famous siege of Paris. In that direful period the field was recognized as being so important, so potential in results. that it fascinated the French mind. This idea became permanently fixed by the government adopting plans for ballooning in the reorganization of the army after the war. Ever since that day France has been systematically working at the problem of aerial navigation and possesses more general experience along these lines than any other nation.

COUNT ZEPPELIN'S FAMOUS AIRSHIP

It was in this "rigid" type of balloon that Zeppelin made his recent successful trip around Lake Constance.

After a prolonged experimental period the year 1877 saw the beginning of the modern ideas of military aeronautics. The Powers quickly recognized the powerful new military arm in air-ships that France was building up and by 1884 England, Germany, Italy, Russia and Spain were working steadfastly and quietly to catch up with her.

The next big step in the conquest of the air came when Otto Lilienthal, a German, put forth his idea of a flying machine "heavier than air," the first crude idea

The Spectator

An Oracle of the Upper Air

The Supreme Court has been again overruled. Not by the college professor of elusive name (Boke or Bloke), but by one equally well qualified as is evident from the fact that such is his proficiency in the science of law, instead of being preoccupied with the practice of it he devotes his time to annotating the codes for a local publishing house. His name is Kerr—James M. Kerr. Never heard of him? Strange. I never heard of him myself until the recent exploitation of his oracular utterances in the two Spreckels organs. But immediately I realized that he must be one of those exalted beings of whose existence we cannot afford to be ignorant. For the Speckels organs treated with profound seriousness the fact that in the course of his masterly annotations Kerr had overruled the Supreme Court. Kerr's decision must be final. Nay it is final unless he should take it into his head to throw in a little obiter dicta for good measure. He might, for example, impose a fine on the court or sentence the court to swallow the whole code. Why should Kerr sit down and rest after so puerile an achievement as the overruling of the Supreme Court of California? Not to animadvert on his work, but for the purpose of celebrating it, I will take occasion to point out the significant coincidence that Mr. Kerr, like his alter ego, Professor Boke, went all the way to England in quest of an authority with which to demolish the decision in the Schmitz case. The authority is the House of Lords, the very same that found favor with Bloke. But Kerr, it should be explained, didn't have to go to England. He tells us that the court erred in not taking judicial notice of Schmitz's official position. This however is not a new point. It was made some time ago by somebody who hasn't been heard from since, for it was then pointed out that while there are certain things and only certain things which the court is empowered by statute to take notice of that particular thing is not one of them. As Chief Justice Beatty has said this fact is so clearly established, so far removed from the domain of speculation, that it was confessed even by the attorneys for the prosecution. How humiliated they must feel now that Sir Oracle Kerr has been heard from.

A wit being asked, after the failure of a bank in which he kept his money: "Were you not upset?" replied: "No, I only lost my balance."

The Greek Drama

Colonel Mutt—Now that's what I call clever work—damned clever. That fellow has Sherlock Holmes lashed to the mast.

Major Mentor—What are you talking about?

Colonel Mutt—I'm talking about the capture of Pete Claudianes in Chicago by means of a decoy letter. Wasn't it clever?

Major Mentor—I should say it was. Much more clever than you think, and well timed too, though for psychological purposes it was of no avail.

Colonel Mutt—What are you driving at now?

Major Mentor—At a coincidence. Claudianes was caught the day before the primary election, just in time for the Bulletin's extra.

Colonel Mutt—Do you think there was design in that?

Major Mentor—Never lose sight of the fact, Colonel, that we are living in a theatrical day and generation. I should think that by this time you'd be wise to the methods that have been employed throughout this whole melodramatic business. Go back over the files of the papers and you'll find that something theatrical was done on the eve of or in the midst of every trial; something to capture the imagination of the public or to influence a jury.

Colonel Mutt—Don't you believe they've got the dynamiters?

Major Mentor—It wouldn't surprise me to learn that they have. I'm in a receptive mood, but not for melodramatics. The decoy letter following the thrilling chase through Nevada with Peter surrounded every inch of the way and rendering himself invisible at will is too much like Dave Belasco. These Greeks may have done the trick, but it's evident to me they are not to be seriously prosecuted. Nor do I think anybody expects to use their confessions for the purpose of convicting the person or persons whom they may charge with having instigated the crime. Viewed as a melodrama the whole affair is very exciting but not convincing. And the singular feature of it all is that the elements which impair the plausibility of the drama are being infused by the men who profess the intention of going into court to make the crime stick.

A Care-Free Club

The Press Club in its new quarters in Bush street has taken a new lease of life. This is what the Press Club has been doing almost since its inception. When it is not taking a new lease of life it is because its energies have not reached their nadir. But true to its bohemian instincts, whatever the record of the club pulse, like Mark Tapley, its spirits are always light and gay. A Press Club jinks is never postponed on account of financial stringency. The treasurer is never consulted when anybody discovers a pretext for a blow-out. There is no institution in the world, (not excluding the religious world) so obedient as the Press Club to the injunction "Take no thought of the morrow." Throughout its career the club has been continually realizing that life is more than meat and the body more than raiment. Perhaps that is why Providence has been so good to the Press Club. For the club has weathered all kinds of financial storms, most of which were precipitated by erring treasurers who were always treated with that divine consideration which that man of boundless sympathy, St. Francis of Assisi, showed even to robbers. And now, as I have said, the club, in luxurious, nay sumptuous quarters, with a fat bank account and a few loving creditors, is taking a new lease of life. Many prodigal sons of the press who wandered after the Babylonian fleshpots of the clubs of Mammon are returning to their first and only congenial love, and journalism once more dominates in a club that for a time was a press club but in name. The annual election of the club will take place in a few weeks, and in all probability William Woodhead, the clever young manager of Sunset, will be elected president, but there is some talk of a contest. Some of the members are in favor of a

The Cleverest Mot

The Cleverest Mot of the Bohemian Club Jinks was that uttered by Judge Kahn of New York, a visitor. At one of the dinners some one was asked to pass the water.

"Who in h—— wants water?" asked a genial clubman.

"Everybody," replied the New Yorker.

The mot was passed down the table, but en route it was attributed to Judge Lawlor. Some one said, "Here what a clever thing Lawlor just said," and repeated the mot. And Judge Lawlor, preoccupied with his plate, did not deny the soft impeachment.

A Literary "Prize"

A reward of $150 is offered by the Literary Bureau of the Republican Congressional Committee operating from Washington, D. C., "for the best Republican campaign article." This offer is misleading as are most of the prize fiction announcements of the newspapers, magazines and literary bureaus. The Republican Congressional Committee is not looking for "the best Republican campaign article"—it is reaching out for an article signed with a name that will "command universal attention." In politics as in commercial literature the name's the thing. If the committee really desired "the best" they would not offer a reward of $150 for it; they would save that money to hire an extra spellbinder, and select from the vast ocean of Republican editorial a suitable article "not exceeding 1000 words," written in "style" to make the ghost of Matthew Arnold green with envy, containing "arguments" that might rouse the ancient sophists from their forgotten tombs, replete with "facts" to satisfy the most exacting Gradgrinds of every crossroads in America, and permeated with a "convincing power" surpassing the orations of Cicero and the eloquence of Burke. It is not the "article" that the committee wants; it's the name behind the article.

Market Price of Masterpieces

A pretty good "article" of this nature ought to be obtained for the price. A thousand words for $150 is at the rate of 15 cents a word—about the Jack London tariff and only ten cents less than is demanded by Rudyard Kipling for a pot boiler. It is eleven cents more than the syndicates pay Ella Wheeler Wilcox, and it exceeds the normal rate of the "Indiana school' by at least seven cents. Milton received only $50 for Paradise Lost, but times, men and manners have changed for the better in the literary world since the days of Milton and the poorest "seller" on the market commands more real money than would have sufficed to keep the "regicide poet" all the years when, "in darkness, and with dangers compass'd round," he moved in solitude. I doubt, however, if Milton, who was the best political pamphleteer of his age, could win that "best Republican campaign article" prize. I am afraid that the low browed "literary bureau" would reject Milton on the plea that his "style" was not "up to the committee's standard."

Tricks of Another Trade

Another reason why the Literary Bureau of the Republican Congressional Committe is advertising for the best Republican campaign article on "Why the Republican Party Should be Successful Next November," is to secure a mass of campaign argument from sources independent of the usual channel. I am led to this "deduction" by the explicit announcement in the advertisement that "no manuscript will be returned, but will be the property of the committee." It's a trick as old as the Vedas and as stale as the sawdust swindle. It has been practiced by the commercial literati of the publishing houses since the days of Cadmus. Thousands will respond to the advertisement of the Republican Congressional Literary Bureau, but only one will get the prize, and that one will bear a name with which the committee can conjure. All the others will be divided between the committee waste basket and the campaign literature published by the bureau. None of the published stuff will be paid for. Even the vultures and cormorants of the publishing houses, whose consciences have been shredded to tatters by constant kicking against their own pricks, pay for what they publish even though they have obtained it by the trick and device of the "prize story" fake. But this political literary bureau will pay for nothing except the bait with which they lure their gudgeons. There may be graft in the publishing trade; there is graft in it; but it is limited to mere larceny; when politicians set up a "literary bureau" they not only steel away the brains of their victim but they sandbag him for his folly.

She—I think it very strange that man was made first.

Princess in Exciting Elopement

Another Austrian Princess, Princess Amalie, has just passed through the European limelight by eloping with and marrying a handsome motor car agent, Lieutenant Koczian. The Princess is 24 years old and a stepsister of Prince Max Egon of Furstenberg, one of the wealthiest men of Germany and a personal friend of the German Emperor. Herr Koczian, who comes from a distinguished Csech family, made the acquaintance of the Princess last year at Carlsbad, where he was acting as agent for a motor car company. Thereafter they kept up a correspondence till last May when the details of the elopement was arranged and they made off in a motor car into Switzerland, accompanied by Lieutenant Koczian's mother. Detectives were at once put on their trail and finally located them. The mother and sister of the Princess hastened at once to Zurich and earnestly begged her to return with them to Austria but she declared that she was determined to marry her lover. They refused to meet the Lieutenant and the latter with his mother left the town for the time being. The young couple at once made secret preparations for their wedding. The mother and sister discovered the arrangements that were being made and were in the chapel of the castle of Kammerburg when the eloping couple reached the place. The weeping mother fell upon her knees and implored the Princess to give up her lover and return home. The intense scene affected the Princess Amalie so much that she fainted. Upon recovering she insisted on going on with the ceremony but she became so weak that she had to be supported. Directly after the marriage the young pair left for Austria.

The Presumption of Innocence

In deciding the Burns contempt case last week Judge Lawlor took occasion to inform us that "extraordinary conditions are prevailing in San Francisco." This is no profoundly wise observation, but it is true and in these days the truth from some sources is very refreshing. If extraordinary conditions were not prevailing in San Francisco Judge Lawlor, in our opinion, would not have given serious consideration to the Hon. Francis J. Heney while that gentleman, with his customary vehemence, argued that the courts of this country are not bound to presume a man to be innocent till he is proved guilty. For while Judge Lawlor is unlearned in the law, having acquired such knowledge of the law as he has since his accession to the bench, and never having had the advantage of the liberal education which is absolutely essential to an appreciation of fundamental principles, yet it is highly improbable that he is ignorant of the principle of the presumption of innocence. Judge Lawlor is surely sufficiently versed in the science of law to know that the very idea of a trial in which the burden of proof is on the prosecution implies that the defendant is presumed to be innocent. Even though he had never read up on the subject it would have occurred to him, a man blessed with an abundance of common sense, that the right to give bail grew out of the principle of the presumption of innocence. This point is very clearly expressed by Francis Lieber, who was corresponding member of the Institute of France, author of "Political Ethics," "Civil Liberty and Self Government," "Principles of Legal and Political Interpretation" and other works through which he won a degree of authority somewhat higher than that enjoyed by the Hon. Francis J. Heney. He says: "But even in the freest country there is this painful yet unavoidable contradiction, that while we hold every person innocent until by lawful trial proved to be guilty, we must arrest a person in order to bring him to a penal trial; and, although by the law he is still considered innocent, he must be deprived of personal liberty until his trial can take place, which cannot follow instantly upon arrest. To mitigate the harshness as much as possible, free nations guarantee the principle of bailing, etc." Of course Judge Lawlor is sensible of these rudimentary principles of the law. But in all probability his senses were in a swoon when he decided the Burns contempt case. It is probably one of the features of the extraordinary prevailing conditions—the swooning of our judges in the midst of their duties. Judge Lawlor apparently has not recovered from the swoon into which he was thrown when called upon to make his deposition in reference to a celebrated midnight meeting.

The Point of the Joke

Despite his weakness there is one of Judge Lawlor's senses that never swoons. We allude to his sense of humor. This is the most virile of his senses. When on the ground of prevailing conditions he exonerated the gumshoe artists who had been tampering with veniremen he achieved a masterpiece of humor, one that clearly indicates his extraordinary capacity for conceiving amusing and hilarious nonsense. It is what might be called an ironical paradox. It reveals touches of the judge's wonderful fluency in indefinite half-truths, his brisk enthusiasm for making comic mockery of the law. The point of the joke is this: however extraordinary prevailing conditions may be, obviously they have been brought about and are being perpetuated by the men whom some of our judges appear to be serving in preference to their conscience. So if it is difficult to get an honest jury in San Francisco today, the difficulty is not one that embarrasses the revolutionary sanhedrim now ruling the city with inflexible arrogance and absolutely indifference to public opinion. It is precisely because of the extraordinary prevailing conditions that gumshoe detectives have the temerity to tamper with juries. They know they will be protected by the police, by the district attorney and by certain judges. They know that all the departments of government are controlled by their employers, the boldest and most sordid set of rascals that ever infested an American city. They see even a majority of the Board of Supervisors, presumably respectable men, obey their masters in defiance of civic bodies and oppressed property owners and at the risk of being abominated for their servility during the remainder of their lives. A remarkable condition of affairs indeed! And Judge Lawlor who is bound to have his little joke, says that Burns's detectives should not be punished for attempting to disqualify jurors by the practice of a cowardly deception. The average dull-witted person will say that in the present state of affairs the courts should endeavor to preserve the sanctity of our jury system. But Judge Lawlor being a humorist perceives the absurdity of bothering about the sanctity of anything at present.

The Torture Chamber

And thus we go from day to day calmly viewing the astonishing and violent anomalies of the present extraordinary condition of affairs. The community seems to be afflicted with a sort of paralysis of the faculty of thought. Each act surpasses its predecessor—a little more shocking, a little more brutal, pushing daring a few steps further, uncovering the inherent infamy of men a little more completely and a little more offensively. There is no absolute goal, or rather the goal is perpetually receding. We read in the papers that a prisoner is being starved in the City Prison with a view to extorting from him incriminating testimony. Nobody demurs. In the year 1908 of the Christian era, the torture chamber, several centuries after its abolition, is revived in the enlightened land of liberty, beneath the stars and stripes, and the people acquiesce in the revival. We bear this crimson shame without a murmur. It excites no aversion, not even in the pulpit, where men with heaven mirrored in their eyes and their senses alert for the manifestation in the clouds promised by Christ, preach to us of the importance of a wholesome public sentiment.

As to Impeachment

What the end will be I have no desire to predict, but I think it proper to suggest the advisability of reviving the agitation which was started by the ineffable Bulletin some months ago in favor of impeachment proceedings in the next Legislature. The Bulletin, after printing the home address of each judge of the Court of Appeal in the hope of inciting a mob, was grieved that it could not occasion bloodshed, and roared itself hoarse on the subject of impeachment proceedings. Since the expression of public sentiment at the polls there has been no more talk of impeachment. But let us hope that we have not heard the end of it. In view of all that has been done in the Superior Court there is abundant material with which to stimulate interest in the next session of the legislature. It ought to be possible not only to impeach a few crooked judges but also with the aid of

Husband (after the theatre)—"Well, how do you like the piece?"

Greeting the Stranger With a Package

Nowadays when a man of prominence in the financial world comes to town he finds, upon reaching his hotel, a neat package addressed to him, and upon opening it he finds that it contains in compact form much interesting information about conditions in the city, comprising a resume of building operations, bank business and all matters pertaining to material progress. These packages of information are prepared by the California Promotion Committee which keeps track of the movements of everybody of prominence en route to San Francisco. Furthermore, members of the committee give their personal attention to many strangers. This missionary system is proving very effective. Its purpose is to establish more cordial relations between the East and California, and it is producing gratifying results.

A Big Dinner Proposed

The systematic efforts of the California Promotion Committee to arouse interest in the resources of the State are now bearing fruit in abundance. So successful has the committee been in stimulating curiosity respecting California that all the big Eastern papers are devoting more or less attention to our industrial affairs. Herman Ridder, President of the New York Staats Zeitung, the most influential German newspaper in America, has begun to take a very deep and kindly interest in California, and he has invited the Promotion Committee to send a delegation of business men to New York to become his guests at a dinner to which he will invite the proprietors and managers of more than a hundred newspapers and magazines and about twenty-five of the leading financiers of the country. He suggests that this ought to be a pretty good way to bring California enterprises in touch with Eastern capital.

Mother Bird—"Run along and play, now; but be careful you don't get run over by any of those flying machines."

Where Depression is Unknown

Among financiers the impression prevails that the industrial depression which followed our panic of a year ago has been felt in all countries of the civilized world. This is not so. Down in the blissful, romantic isles of Hawaii, where they raise sugar, alligator pears and bananas, nothing has occurred to reduce the speed of the wheels of industry. This is the news that Mr. Louis Rosenthal, the marine insurance magnate, brings over the bounding wave. Mr. Rosenthal is the man who, as the representative of what are perhaps the strongest marine insurance companies in the world—the Swiss Marine and Thames & Mersey—is very deeply interested in the shipping on the Pacific. He returned this week from a business trip to the Hawaiian Islands, and he reports that those islands were never more prosperous than at present. The sugar planters were about to harvest a crop when the panic struck this continent and all the world felt the effect of the money stringency. Now it requires considerable money to harvest the Hawaiian sugar crop, and yet, notwithstanding the panic, there was a bank in Honolulu with the lubricant required for the wheels of industry and the willingness to supply all that was needed. It was the Yokohama Specie Bank which has a branch in this city. It was a record crop that was harvested and the profits were prodigious. According to Mr. Rosenthal the Hawaiian Islands are only in their early stage of development. New industries are now being promoted, and already the lumber industry is one that is attaining large proportions. There are immense forests on one of the islands, from which, by the way, the Santa Fe Railway Company is getting its ties.

Surprise Valley Soon to be Accessible

Modoc County, away up in the extreme northeastern corner of the State, is coming into its own. Modoc County has a peculiar history, so far as development is concerned, in that it was one of the first parts of the State to receive attention from settlers, and has been the slowest to become known. In the early 'fifties a band of homeseekers crossed the plains in wagons for the gold fields of California. They reached what is now Modoc County, and found a beautiful valley, with a most luxuriant growth of grass. The homeseekers decided to stop there and believed that they could not find a more suitable spot for a home. They abandoned the idea of seeking gold and became farmers, calling the place "Surprise Valley." Today this is one of the rich valleys of California, and the descendants of those early settlers possess the land. But Modoc County was shut away from the rest of the world, and there has been no progress or development in all these intervening years. The Nevada-California-Oregon Railway is now hard at work changing conditions in Modoc County, and by October expects to have trains running to Alturas, the county seat. This will mean the opening of a rich county, and will also bring within easy access one of the best game countries of California, Goose Lake in Modoc County abounds in water fowl, while the adjacent woods are full of deer, bear and small game.

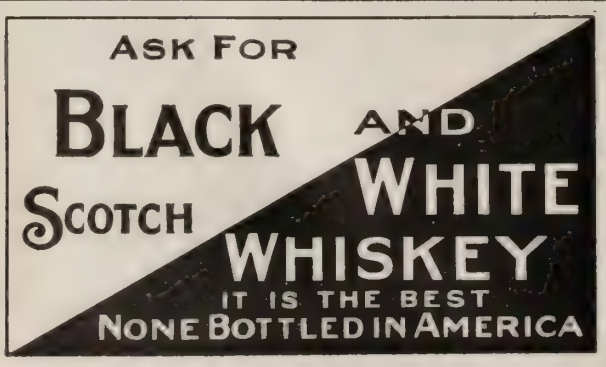
Morrissey Talks of Pastor



John Morrissey of the Orpheum was thrown into reminiscent mood the other day when he read that Tony Pastor was at death's door. "It grieves me," said Morrissey, "to hear that Tony is about to cash in. He is one of the biggest-hearted men in the theatrical business. But we all have to go some time and Tony is pretty old. I think he's in the seventies. He was the first manager of a first class vaudeville house. He started his career as a singer at temperance revivals and then he organized a concert company. Later he took up clowning and stuck to circuses until 1861 when he turned up at the Broadway Music Hall as a comic singer. In 1861 he went to the famous 444 Broadway and in the war time he aroused enthusiasm by appearing on the stage with a big flag and urging every one to join with him in singing "The Star Spangled Banner." Here it was that he saw the future of vaudeville. Variety shows at that time were a little too coarse for family consumption. Tony Pastor decided to branch out as a manager and put out a variety show on a higher plane. His money went into the idea and, with Sam Sharpley, the minstrel manager, he leased the Volks Garden at 201 Bowery and in March, 1865, he announced vaudeville fit for women to attend. He was a vaudeville manager always after that."

Gave Lillian Her Stage Name

Continuing Morrissey related that Pastor introduced Nat Goodwin to the New York public. Also that he introduced Lillian Russell and bestowed on that beautiful woman her stage name. That was in 1876. She was a Miss Leonard and asked Pastor's advice about changing her name for professional purposes. He suggested "Lillian Russell" and she approved. May Irwin and her sister, Flo, played under his management early in their careers, as did many others whose names are now well known both in vaudeville and in the so-called "legitimate." Some of them, who might well be called the Pastor alumni and alumnae, are Florence Bindley, Gus Williams, Richard Carroll, Francis Wilson, a song and dance artist under Pastor; Denman Thompson, later of "Old Homestead" fame; "Old Hoss" Hoey and his partner, Charley Evans; Bill Barry, who did his first negro monologue for Tony; Jennie Yeamans and Pat Rooney. Pastor also introduced the first version of condensed comic opera in his presentation of "Pinafore" at the old theatre. In 1881 he moved his place to Fourteenth street and there he brought out Jenny Hill, the English music hall singer; Vesta Tilley, Bessie Bonehill, Bessie Belwood and Vesta Victoria.

Illusive Fees

In a hotel lobby the other evening a group of old time politicians were discussing the forthcoming flight of spellbinders over the land and the recompense they were likely to receive. Colonel Tom Fitch was appealed to as being an expert on the subject. Incidentally he was charged with having received some of the biggest fees in the West for his silver tongued flights of oratory. The Colonel laughed and declared that out of the fourteen canvasses he had made on this coast since 1860, he never received anything more than his expenses and frequently paid those out of his own pocket—except in one instance.

That was in 1890 when Stanford was a candidate for re-election to the Senate. The campaign was nearing its close when a leading member of the State Central Committee approached Fitch and said that his services as a speechmaker were wanted in order to properly finish off the campaign. Fitch declared he was out of harness and didn't want the job. The Committeeman insisted that it was a matter of business and ended his plea with "name your price for seven speeches." "In order to get rid of him off hand," said Fitch, "I said $5,000, never supposing for a moment that such a sum would be paid; but it was, and I traveled that week with the Senator and did the best I could for him, though at the time I did not think my services were worth more than one-third of that sum. Later on while in Arizona I happened to read a report of the evidence given by Senator Stanford before a grand jury in which he testified that during the political campaign he had paid Tom Fitch $10,000 for his services. I confess that statement jolted me. My first impulse was to run down that committeeman and get the other $5,000 that had been held out on me. My affairs delayed me awhile and when I reached him his funeral was over; illustrating again how fees will slip through the honest earner's hands.

Mabelle Has Arrived

Papa Gilman having been suppressed the fair Mabelle is now queening it in Paris and satisfying the very top-loftiest of her social aspirations. A friend writes me from the gay capital that the California girl who abandoned the stage, which had never been very kind to her, to become the wife of Millionaire Corey, has climbed into the very midst of the aristocracy. In her magnificent Chateau Villegines, which once belonged to Napoleon, she has entertained many distinguished persons. But the scene of her greatest triumph was the Hotel Ritz where the Coreys gave a dinner in honor of the Crown Prince of Greece. The dinner took place in the gardens of the hotel which were exquisitely decorated for the occasion. Among the guests were about fifty people of title.

Luxurious Americans in London

The scale on which the millionaire Americans live who go over to England to reside for a few seasons may be gauged by the house which Athony Drexel, the New York banker, has just leased in London for seven years. The mansion was built for extensive entertaining, judging by the size of its ballroom, reception, billiard and dining rooms. There are also spacious halls, minstrels' galleries and a wide staircase entirely of Mezzano and Ezchallion marble. Charles Allom, who planned and decorated the new ballroom for the King at Buckingham Palace and reconstructed Brook House for Sir Ernest Cassel, has been responsible for the decorations, which are of the Louis XVI period. Parquet floors of the design at the Petit Trianon are laid in the salons, and the bronze balustrades and rails are in harmony with ornaments of the same period. No fewer than twenty-two bedrooms and bathrooms are provided for guests. The floors of the bathrooms are paved with India rubber tiles. There are electric passenger, luggage and food elevators. Aside from its present attractions Mr. Drexel will have it refitted with many devices to afford comfort and luxury to meet his own personal wants.

A Pioneer's Daughter

In the despatches from New York last Wednesday was told the story of the triumph at the Criterion Theatre of Miss Isadora Duncan. Since Maude Allan's hit in her Salome dance in London there hasn't been much said of Miss Duncan though to her belongs the credit of being the first to create an interest in the old Greek dances, of which the Salome dance is but a variation. Miss Duncan, by the way, is a California girl. She is the daughter of J. C. Duncan, a California pioneer who figured in a very sensational financial crash in the 'seventies. He was president of the Pioneer Dime Savings Bank, the wreck of which was a most disastrous affair. It was in his beautiful home that his daughter's artistic temperament was developed. The Duncan home was filled with works of art. Greek art was the banker's hobby. When Isadora Duncan made her big hit in Berlin some years ago a friend of the family told me that when she was at the age at which children delight in fairy stories her father regaled her with stories of life in Greece. And even in those days the girl evinced an aptitude for classic posing, spending much of her time imitating the postures of the statues in her father's house. She afterwards studied the terpsichorean art with the celebrated teacher

Kuhne Beveridge Bobs Up

Another Californian has been figuring in the despatches. When Kuhne Beveridge became the wife of a Mr. Branson of Johannesburg some years ago it was predicted that she would abandon the limelight and retire to private life in South Africa, but that darling of the Sunday Supp. is once more furnishing copy for the press. Was there ever a more artful advertiser than Kuhne Beveridge? Before she was out of her teens the papers in this city were playing her up as a great sculptor. For whenever Kuhne goes a-sculpturing she makes it a point to be inspired only by persons in the public eye. The man of the hour is always the man for Kuhne. She has made the bust of nearly every world-wide celebrity from Cecil Rhodes to President Roosevelt. And when she wasn't getting fame from her art she was getting publicity in other ways. Once she got it by marrying Charles Coglan the actor. And now we learn from the despatches, as though it were a piece of news of tremendous significance in the art world, that Kuhne is to work on a draped Venus this winter; also that Kuhne has chosen her sister Ray Beveridge to pose for the draped Venus and that she intends to turn out a Venus that will look more like the goddess of love than anything in bronze or marble.

The Rural District Teacher

Editor Town Talk: The new salary schedule of the school department has gone into effect, and some of the employees are discovering, much to their surprise and indignation, that "experience" is not to be gained outside of a city graded school. Time was when, under another dispensation every applicant was commanded to acquire the ungraded-district-school brand of experience forthwith and instanter before daring to approach the august body of assembled school directors, but that is both an old and another story. Those who have served an apprenticeship in ungraded district schools, where the classes range from kindergarten to college preparatory, and where the solitary preceptor must serve as class instructor, specialist in all the fads, and resident nurse, not to mention the janitorship, and to be principal and intermediary, as well as to supervise the board of trustees and see that such minor matters as taking the annual census, making the necessary reports to the county superintendent, arranging for the opening of the school term so that the sessions may fall between the legally appointed dates, and that the premises may be fit for habitation, a supply of water and fuel provided and at least a few of the most essential articles of equipment, such as seats, blackboards, chalk and ink, are on hand, are accustomed to say that teaching a city class bears the same relation to the multifarious duties of the ungraded school that sitting in the audience and looking on at the performance does to the feats of legerdemain of the juggling vaudeville performer. It is a fortunate "inexperienced" country teacher who has never learned to gauge time by a noon-mark or to teach geography without a map, or history without reference books as supplements. Has it ever occurred to my lords, the directors of educational affairs, that the enforced absence of the children of one household may throw an extra hour on hands to be utilized to the best advantage without preliminary planning, while the advent of one or two abcdarians in the middle of the term, or of children transferred from another county, whose schedule of work does not coincide, will call for readjustment of time which means that the "inexperienced" teacher, whose hours already range from nine till four, equivalent to six city days, every week in the term, must bring up the delinquents at recess time? Country teachers, who lack "experience" are expected to be on hand on winter mornings before the first of their charges arrive. They must often wade through a mile or more of mud and wet, in order to have the room warm for such as may put in an appearance, and it is they who are responsible for seeing that fires are out, doors and windows closed, public property secured, and dry fuel provided for next morning. such conditions, and must have learned how to utilize every moment to the best advantage, and to keep nine or ten classes of all ages and both sexes, not to mention every degree of unwillingness, busy from morning till night on a course of study the counterpart of that provided for the city classes. It would be an amusing and instructive sight for any of the initiated to look on at the efforts of some male know-it-all, who has never been called upon in the whole of his life to do more than keep one foot from tripping up the other in a cut-and-dried formula, attempting, for just one six-hour day to keep up with the tasks which fall, as a matter of course, to an "inexperienced" teacher in an ungraded district school.

Mrs. Lowenberg's Book a Best Seller

In the eastern papers these days one comes across some very complimentary comments on Mrs. Lowenberg's novel "The Irresistible Current," but these are doubtless less gratifying to the author than the fact that so great has been the demand for the book a second edition has been ordered. Mrs. Lowenberg has achieved a notable success. None more remarkable was ever achieved by a California writer. "The Irresistible Current" was put on the market one month ago. Before the expiration of the first month of its existence the publishers decided upon printing a second edition. Yet this is Mrs. Lowenberg's first novel. It is not selling on the reputation of a predecessor from the same pen. Nor has it been advertised through that most effective of all boom methods —condemnation. The book is happily free from sensationalism of all kinds. It is a novel with a very serious purpose. It contains a message, and as that message is of a religious nature, it is evident from the great demand for the book that readers of fiction have a taste for something more profitable than sensationalism. Mrs. Lowenberg tells an interesting story and vividly presents some unique characters and much diverting action. By the way, I hear that the novel, which abounds in sociological questions of rare intellectual interest is to be taken up for discussion by some of our local clubs.

There has been quite a reversal in opinion during the past week in Wall street securities brought about chiefly as the result of Thomas W. Lawson's "Monte Carlo" proposition. Mr. Lawson will only require one billion dollars to finance through a corporation whose privileges embrace everything except climbing a tree. It is really wonderful how Lawson reaches the public (who have a few dollars saved up). It makes good reading, but throws time away to review some of his past promotions. Most of them were handed to the public at the very highest price, soon declining to one-half their original cost, or going clear off the boards. Bay State Gas has been practically given to purchasers of a pound of tea until a few days ago; Boston shares (half) are selling at $1.50 per share, while the New York quotation is $3.00 for full shares. Many of the best stock exchange houses have refused to trade in Lawson's promotion securities. The general result to stock exchange securities has not been in favor of holders. Bankers do not view matters of this kind as affording them security. In consequence, the market, as a whole, suffered from five to seventeen dollars decline; the rapid advance in values during the past six weeks made Lawson's attack an easy one. American Smelters and Amalgamated Copper were the breast works charged upon. The selling out of weak holders' accounts in these stocks caused a panicky appearance at times which reflected its influence throughout the whole list of stocks and bonds. Added to this scare were rumors of a political character, also that railroads would not be able to carry out their plan to inaugurate a new system of rates upon an equalizing basis, which would procure for them a slight advance in revenue. There is no doubt about the upward trend having received a set-back. Investors are disposed to await a more definite period before taking on new commitments. Many of the railway shares are selling under a 5 per cent basis; this of itself had something to do with the halting of the advance. So many uncertainties present themselves during a presidential campaign that cautious investors keep close to shore. That a higher market will come later is voiced by the most conservative bankers. Railroad earnings are showing improvements, probably not as much as might be desired, yet the tide has turned in a marked degree, and a little time will adjust all matters of a monetary character.

The Wall Street Journal says: "Securities of Union Pacific have appreciated $75,000,000. Fourteen stocks held in the company's treasury have benefited to that extent by recovery. Increase in value of the 900,000 shares of Southern Pacific Common from low of 1907 to date sufficient to pay the Standard Oil—holdings of Baltimore & Ohio and Southern Preferred have each increased $6,000,000 in value. The upward movement of the market has worked a great change in the value of the stocks and bonds held in the treasury of the Union Pacific. Thus the appreciation in the total value of the 900,000 shares of Southern Pacific common alone from the low point last fall to the closing price last Tuesday means more than $29,000,000 to the controlling company, or enough to pay the Standard Oil fine. With the advance in the value ni the 342,000 shares of preferred the company's ownership of Southern Pacific stock is worth $35,000,000 more than it was during the panic period."

The improvement in crops during the past week has been very marked, prices have made quite a strong decline reflecting the improved conditions. Harvesting in the middle northwest is progressing rapidly under the most favorable conditions. The weather conditions throughout the cotton and corn belts could not be better; the greatest fear now is that an early frost may come to injure either of these crops. The corn and cotton crops are from two to three weks late this year, causing more or less apprehension even at this early date. Corn has been shipped into the United States recently from the Argentine for the first time, this in the face of the largest corn crop ever grown in the United State (3,000,000,000) three billion bushels, showing home requirements are exceeding our production. At the average increase of consumption of wheat seen during the past five years, within seven years America will not have a bushel of wheat to export. The consumption of oats is also growing at a rapid pace; all of these conditions reflect themselves in the way of railway transportation, in the way of live stock, hog products, flour, etc., meaning greater railroad earnings.

Local securities continue in good demand. Money appears more plentiful; good bonds meet ready sale. Commercial paper is also in better demand; wholesale houses report collections much improved, and country orders more in evidence.

Heart Pangs Outside the Crocker Dance

There are a number of mothers limping around with a puncture in the family pride, because their darlings were not invited to Ethel Crocker's dance. Everyone, with any claim to social distinction, coveted invitations for their young hopefuls, but many that might have expected them searched in vain through the morning mail. Mrs. Crocker is in poor health and it was argued that her secretary must have managed the affair. But it was Miss Ethel herself who drew up the guest list and attended to every detail of the affair as her mother thought the experience would make her more self reliant. People supposed to be "close up" were besieged with requests to use their influence. A substantial matron who asked Miss Lily Lawlor to procure invitations for her son and daughter has told any number of people that "Miss Lawlor is just too mean!" And thus are friendships broken! Miss Guissie Foute, who is a very frequent visitor at the Crocker home, also was forced to refuse a dozen or more girls who asked her to use her influence in her tactful way. One clever and large hearted Miss who was invited did squeeze in two of her girl friends who might have expected to be asked. The girls live across the bay and she invited them to her home and then telephoned to Ethel Crocker that she had house guests and so couldn't come to the dance. On hearing who they were Miss Crocker, of course, said "bring them along."

Miss Crocker Went Fishing Instead

Miss Jennie Crocker constantly celebrates the Fourth of July with her disposition. Every day on the calendar is an Independence day with her. While she is very fond of her numerous relatives they rarely succeed in boring a hole through her determination to do things according to the dictates of her own sweet will. For example, Miss Crocker was not present at the dance given by Mrs. William Crocker for her daughter, Miss Ethel Mary Crocker. To be sure Ethel Mary is only in the near-debutante set, and Jennie Crocker has always shown a preference for girls half past her own age. However, it was expected that she would take a position somewhere down centre front, when the calcium was turned on at the dance. Instead she went choo-chooing in her private car for a week-end fishing trip on the McCloud river. The Alexander girls stayed behind for the dance although Miss Crocker had whipped their imagination with stories of the delights of the McCloud Country Club. She, herself, was just a bit disappointed in the trip as not a single rattlesnake glided across their path. Ever since Miss Crocker was in at the killing of a rattlesnake on the road to Tahoe last year she has been anxious to put another notch in her gun.

Cleverness of Mrs. Breckenridge

Addie Murphy Breckenridge is the true daughter of her father. No one ever catches her napping. She is a picturesque Sapphira and draws the long bow frequently but always with artistic effect. She adores her life in Paris and is not sorrowing about anyone. At the time of the marriage of Ernest Wiltsee and Miss Emily Taylor an invitation was sent by Miss Taylor to Mrs. Breckenridge. Later, Miss Taylor discovered that Mr. Wiltsee and Mrs. Breckenridge were not good friends. So Miss Taylor wrote to Miss Breckenridge saying that a wedding invitation had been mailed her by mistake. Would she please consider it cancelled? The invitations had of course been issued in the name of Miss Taylor's mother and to her Mrs. Breckenridge wrote: "I have just received a most extraordinary letter from your daughter, asking me to cancel some invitation. I have received no invitation which answers her description. To what invitation does she refer?"

No Longer Uses Piquant Slang

A former chum of Adelaide Murphy's, now Mrs. Breckenridge, tells me that while she was in Paris she saw very little of Mrs. Breckenridge as the latter now disdains anyone who is not stoopshouldered with ambition. Social ambition does not weigh on her scales and the only sort that is accepted as standard is that which makes for a public career in one of the arts. An inky forefinger points the way to her favor better than a highly polished hand. Her pet name for her father is still "Bunko Bill" but her vocabulary, once so choice with the latest and most piquant slang, no longer even sounds as familiar as colloquial English. She does not even sing or whistle, much less speak, anything but French.

Pioneering a New Fad

Mrs. Willard Drown is pioneering a new fad. Knitting has for some time been fashionable in smart society as a suitable mental exercise for a post graduate course on the veranda or in the garden. This exhilarating pastime has not been confined to private homes, but is found in every circular on hotel etiquette. It is eminently good form at Del Monte to click your crochet needles wherever a chair is handy, and if it were not for the fact that perpendicular amusements keep one trained down to sheath proportions, cards and knitting would divide the day. However, it has remained for Mrs. Drown to acclimate the fad to city life. A great deal of time is necessarily spent on the street cars and ferry boats in these days of suburban life, when most every body lives at least two games of bridge and a rubber from the shopping district. Mrs. Drown has discovered a way of putting in her time that even the Ladies Aid Society could not find objectionable. The other day she created a mild sensation on the Ross Valley train by taking out her knitting and industriously counting stitches all the way to Sausalito. The chug chug of the ferry boat did not interfere with her work, and when I caught a last glimpse of her on the San Mateo car she was still industriously twiddling her needless instead of twirling her thumbs like the rest of the passengers. Doubtless before this goes to publication Mr. Willard Drown will have appeared on 'Change in a brand new silk crochet tie, a sample of home industry practiced abroad. Since then, during the hours of the day when the cars are not very crowded I have seen several stunning looking girls busily crocheting between transfer points. And still the crabbed critics of wealthy women paste them over with such phrases as "slothful idleness!"

Has Shocked Society

Philadelphia society is very much shocked over the announcement that A. J. Drexel Biddle has announced his intention of going into systematic training preparatory to touring the country willing to meet any man of his weight in the roped arena. This announcement will be specially interesting here as a number of Californians have married into that exclusive family. The Drexel and the Biddle clans are aghast at the idea of all this notoriety. Mrs. Tony Biddle, the wife, is in tears, while her pugilistically inclined husband cooly continues his preparations to win renown in the roped arena. He is said to yearn for newspaper fame and to stand at the head of the middleweight division with the championship belt in his hand. Relatives are pleading with him and hopes are high that the unpleasant matter will be quickly settled. The Californian relatives are holding aloof from the trouble.

Mrs. Bryan's engagement to Prentiss Cobb Hale has just been announced. The marriage will take place next month.

Used the Wrong Dye

A middle aged cavalier, who divides his time between the Burlingame and the Bohemian clubs, has gone into temporary retirement, and his best friends have not been able to rout him out. Incidentally a young woman, the daughter of his closest friend, may be cheated out of an inheritance which every one has always taken it for granted the wealthy bachelor would leave her in the smooth course of human events. The story goes that when the young woman suggested to him that he try a certain hair tonic on his mustachios, she was innocent of intent to hold him up to ridicule. They have both recently been house guests at a country home near Napa, and as the gentleman spent most of the month in the open with the sun beating down upon him, the heat rays combined with a lifetime smoking habit, managed to make his iron gray mustache take on the tones of greengage plum. So a day or two before starting for the city he diligently applied the proffered tonic, and just before driving to the station applied a generous dose. The sun did the rest. A friend, whom he met at the ferry, jellied with laughter at the sight of him; the boys at the club doubled up when he asked them to "have one," and even the cashier in the bank where he sought to replenish his purse let a gingerly smile escape. The Chinese cook in his bachelor apartment forgot his bland and oriental code of manners and chuckled in pigeon English. Mystified he sought the mirror and found that his mustache had turned a passionate, regular Leslie Carter red. He refused to cut it, seeking retirement instead until the hair resumes its natural color.

The Bogie Man

At a recent luncheon given at a Bohemian resort in the outskirts of San Rafael an Eastern guest said: "Really the state of things here is awful. I'm told that if I'm seen talking to one woman it will be taken as disloyalty to another and all because of this graft prosecution. It is really dreadful." A woman of wit beckoning to a waiter, asked him for a blank card. When it was brought to her she wrote on it with a pencil, carefully concealing it the while, "Francis J. Heney" and had the waiter take the card to the Eastern guest who had opened the conversation. That lady adjusted her lorgnette, read the card and gasped as though she had been bitten by an asp. "Francis J. Heney!" she cried. "What on earth can he want with me? Tell him 'No, I certainly will not see him.'" The waiter retired and a profound silence hung over the table. There was another luncheon party of San Rafael ladies in the next booth and these were gaily chattering and laughing. The alarming card was sent in to one of the guests at that luncheon and instantly a frightful silence fell on the merry party.

Genthe, Photo. MISS MARGUERITE LE BRETON

"Reminds one of Napoleon's name in England at the time of the Napoleaonic wars," said one of the women who is up in her history.

"Pooh, that's entirely too complimentary," said another.

"Oh, well, Napoleon met his Waterloo," returned the first.

Betrayed by a Postscript

Usually it is difficult to summarily dismiss a familiar name from one's vocabulary and glibly pronounce its successor. But in the case of Mrs. Linda Bryan, who will soon be Mrs. Prentiss Cobb Hale, the feat will not be laborious, for this popular matron has always been called "Mrs. Linda," without any surname tagging after, by a wide circle of friends. The girls, who always crowd the perspective, wherever she is found, and the men who circle round, in fact, her entire set have known for some time that "Mrs. Linda" was secretly watching the light and shadow effects on an engagement ring, and was learning to drive the $10,000 machine which her fiance had presented to her. But neither the lady nor her cavalier would confirm the rumor until they were tripped up by the click click of the telegraph machine. Mrs. Bryan thought her secret would be safe in St. Louis, so in a confidential mood she added a postscript to a letter to a bachelor friend there. Forthwith, that delighted friend, not knowing that postscripts are always the important and secret reasons for writing a letter at all, telegraphed the news to friends in this city and Mrs. Bryan and Mr. Hale had to sit up and take notice that half a secret is none at all. Mrs. Bryan is the daughter of Mrs. William Walter Felton, whose husband is a wealthy resident of Mazatlan. Mrs. Bryan has frequently chaperoned parties on visits to Mexico, in fact in the set in which she moves she is the most popular chaperone and is always in demand. She is a director in a number of charitable organizations and after the fire took a zealous interest in the welfare of the firemen and their families. Her daughter, who has long been called "baby" Linda, has outgrown the sobriquet and will soon be of debutante age. Two boys complete this interesting family group to which Mr. Hale will be added possibly some time in September. Although a member of the firm of Hale Brothers he had made his residence in the East until after the big fire. To the delight of her wide and cosmopolitan circle of friends he will not take his bride East to live.

The Duncan-Girvin Engagement

Another recently announced engagement which occasioned no surprise among their friends was that of Miss Pauline Duncan, a niece of Mrs. Edward L. Griffiths of Ross Valley and Richard Girvin, son of Mr. and Mrs. R. D. Girvin of Menlo Park. Miss Duncan came out here from the East with her parents on a visit to Mrs. Duncan's mother, Mrs. Coppie, and made a host of friends. Mr. Duncan is a mining engineer in the East. I hear the wedding will not take place for some time. Mrs. Girvin was Miss Maggie Eyre, daughter of the late Colonel and Mrs. E. E. Eyre.

Society Events at Del Monte

My Monterey correspondent writes that Del Monte is looking forward to a very lively period with the bench show on the 28th and 29th of this month, the golf tournament which will extend from August 31st until September 5th, and the tennis tournament commencing September 7th. Society women are particularly interested in the dog show which is expected to exceed in the number of entries and in the prominence of the exhibitors the one given last year. Among those who have entered their canine pets are Miss Jennie Crocker, one of whose Boston terriers won the challenge cup for the best dog in the show last year; Mrs. William C. Ralston, whose cocker spaniels are among the finest in the country; Mrs. Nat T. Messer, whose Airedale terriers were cup winners last year; Mrs. J. A. Wiborn, whose bull dog walked away with a cup at the same show; Mrs. Charles K. Harley, Mrs. Porter Ashe, Mrs. H. N. Cook, Miss Marguerite Barron, Miss Ethel Dean and many others whose blooded pets are the pride of their mistresses' hearts.

Among the visitors at Del Monte is Mrs. William Howard, formerly of Menlo Park, but now of Boston. Later she will visit the city when she will be the object of much entertaining, as when here, she was one of the most prominent society women in California. Mr. and Mrs. C. B. Alexander and their three daughters, Miss Harriet, Miss Janetta and Miss Mary Alexander arrived here on Saturday and will remain until after the dog show and the golf tournament. They will be joined this week by Miss Jennie Crocker and her brother, Templeton Crocker, who are coming for the same affairs.

Mrs. J. S. Oyster and her daughter, Miss Elizabeth Oyster, were here for a few days having motored down from the city to spend a few days with Mrs. Oyster's mother, Mrs. A. L. Tubbs, and Mr. and Mrs. Alfred S. Tubbs. The Oysters will return later for the golf tournament. Mr and Mrs. William B. Tubbs will also be here for that event.

Miss Jennie Flood is expected here on the 20th for an extended stay. Among those who motored here last week were Mrs. F. E. Moore and Miss Marguerite Moore, Miss Moore having driven her car herself all the way from Los Angeles.

Mrs. Columbus Waterhouse was here for a few days and was joined by her daughter-in-law, Mrs. S. W. Waterhouse, who motored down from San Jose for a few days visit.

Samuel G. Wilder, Miss Helen K. Wilder and Samuel G. Wilder, Jr. of Honolulu, spent several days here last week. Miss Wilder was written up in the San Francisco newspapers at one time as having been on the police force in Honolulu. It was learned later that she was acting as special officer for a humane society. She wore a policeman's star and was known as a fearless horseback rider.

Abducted by Her Parents

Miss Ethel B. Ludwig, who is now happily married to Professor Fred F. Fitzgerald of Stanford, has had a much happier experience in her alleged abduction than did Mlle. Bassot, the daughter of General Bassot, in Paris recently. Mlle. Bassot was leaving church Sunday morning when a man of herculean build seized her, forced her into an automobile conveniently posted near the church door and sprang in after her. The auto mobile started off and was flying along at top speed before the spectators could collect enough breath to scream. Was it an elopement or an abduction? That was the mystery. All Paris was thrilled at first and then was shocked to learn that Mlle. Bassot had been carried off by her mother, who disapproved of her determination to devote her life to charitable work, and that she had been confined in a private asylum in Geneva. Mlle. Bassot had anticipated her parents would make some attempt to frustrate her philanthropic projects and had given written instructions to a barrister to begin proceedings against them if she were to disappear. Maitre Clunet upon learning of the incident laid the case before the Public Prosecutor. The head of the private asylum where she had been taken read in the Paris papers an account of the abduction and realized that the medical certificate which had been given him declaring Mlle. Bassot of weak mind had been obtained by some intrigue, and promptly informed her she was free. The unfortunate girl returned to Paris and insisted on a prosecution against her parents.

Mary Anderson in Later Life

Mary Anderson entered on her fiftieth year on Tuesday, July 28, and the statement is borne out by documentary evidence of her birth at Sacramento in 1858. Twelve of those years—from her sixteenth to her twenty-eighth—were spent on the stage, and all London rushed to see the young actress, who, if she were not a heaven born genius, was delightful to look at. But the glamour of the footlights soon palled. Miss Anderson settled down to a calm life at old fashioned Broadway, a quaint sport in the heart of England, where there is an American colony to keep green the memory of Mme. de Navarro's native land.

In the Social Spotlight

The Perry Eyres are enjoying the south of France. Miss Cora Parker is with them.

Mr. and Mrs. A. Tonn announce the engagement of their daughter Ruby to Mr. Louis Scheeline.

Mrs. Charles W. Clark is expected home in a fortnight, after a two months' visit in England and France.

Miss Genevieve Harvey spent the week end with the Peter Martins in Burlingame.

The Douglas Watsons are still enjoying Southern California.

Mr. and Mrs. C. O. G. Miller will give up their Ross home for the season and return to town in October.

From Paris comes the news that a little son has been born there to Mr. and Mrs. Ernest E. Wiltsee. They left here about six months ago after a short visit.

Mrs. Louis B. Parrott is in Zurich.

Since their recent marriage, Mr. and Mrs. John S. Drum have been occupying their home in Ross. They will spend the winter in the Drum home in Broadway.

Mrs. Kitty Staples Yeamens was hostess on Tuesday last at a delightful tea given in honor of the charming daughters of Colonel and Mrs. Robinson. Miss Robinson has lately returned from Washington, D. C., while her sister, Mrs. Wheatley, wife of Captain Wheatley, U. S. A., Whipple Barracks, Arizona, is here on a visit to her parents. She will stay several weeks.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Stewart will leave, Monday next, on a two months trip to New York and Washington. Mr. Stewart is called East on several very important law cases and while he is thus engaged his wife will visit several relatives and a number of old time friends.

Mr. and Mrs. Frank Findley will soon leave Sausalito for an extended eastern trip. They will rent their beautiful home on the hill, as business will keep Mr. Findley away the greater part of the next year. Mrs. Findley is a sister of H. Clay Miller whose marriage to Miss Madeline Bohrmann will soon take place.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry C. Campbell and her daughter, Miss Frances Reed, are at present visiting in Cambridge, Mass. They will return to their home in Sausalito the last of September.

Mr. and Mrs. W. E. Kent of Kentfield, who recently returned from a visit East when they met President Roosevelt, are spending a few weeks at Tahoe. They came down from the lake for the Kentfield affair, last Saturday, and returned the following day.

Mr. and Mrs. Benjamin Selby, formerly Miss May Reis, who have been residing in New York since their marriage a year ago, will come to California early in October on a visit to Mrs. Selby's sister, Mrs. Willian Huie.

Mrs. Cæsar Bertheau will give a large dance at the California Club on August 28th in honor of her daughter, Miss Helen, who will make here debut this winter.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry Van Dyck Johns will leave early in October for a visit of several months with relatives in Baltimore.

Mrs. A. W. Blow and her attractive daughter, Miss Nina Blow, who have been visiting Captain and Mrs. Ray, U. S. A., at Mare Island since the death of Mr. Blow some months ago, will spend the coming winter in town. Mrs. Blow was Miss Georgie Richards, Mrs. Ray was Miss Sadie Richards. The late Mr. A. W. Blow belonged to a prominent Oakland family and was also connected by marriage with the Glascocks of Oakland.

Miss Ethel Lincoln has gone to the Yosemite, the guest for several weeks of Major and Mrs. Benson.

Mrs. Le Roy Nickel will leave shortly for New York where she will enter her daughter in school.

Miss Elizabeth Parran Simpson, daughter of Colonel W. A. Simpson, Adjunt General of the Department of California, after graduating from an eastern seminary, arrived in town this week.

Senator and Mrs. Newlands are domiciled at the Fairmont for a season.

Miss Molly Dutton has returned home from her trip abroad.

Mrs. James Hubert Mee, well known in San Rafael and San Francisco circles, is still at Tahoe Tavern. Mr. Mee left for the East a few days ago, after a two weeks' visit at the lake.

Annual Dog Show at Del Monte

Next week's Dog Show at Del Monte will furnish the "motif" for a number of delightful week end parties. Some large parties will motor down Thursday and Friday, while those less fortunate will make up the groups which take advantage of the special rates made by the railroad company for the occasion.

Everything indicates that this year's event will be a record breaker in both entry list and attendance. The entry list which has just closed shows as fine lot of canines of every sort, size, color and degree as one would want to see. The advance reservations now being made at the Hotel warrants the assumption that those who have entered their dogs will be there with all their friends to see them win. The trophies which are on exhibition at a well known jewelry store provide awards for many different classes. Expert Eastern judges have been brought here to decide on the merits of each class.

The show opens Friday, August 28th, and ends Saturday, August 29th. The prizes will be awarded in the parlors of the Hotel on Saturday night. The usual Saturday evening dance will follow.

Among the prominent lady dog fanciers who will exhibit their prize winners at Del Monte are Miss Jennie Crocker, Boston terriers; Miss Kempff, Miss Wolfen, Miss Ethel Tompkins and Mrs. W. C. Ralston, cocker spaniels; Miss Irving Ackerman, Miss Frances Reid, Mrs. Norman J. Stewart, Mrs. Charles Harley, toy Pomerians; Mrs. George Monteith and Mrs. George Flexnor, bull terriers; Mrs. H. N. Cook and Miss Helen Stewart, French bulldogs; Mrs. Phil M. Wand, Dachshundes; Mrs. N. B. Lister, collies; Mrs. Captain Saxe and Mrs. Porter Ashe, Great Danes; Mrs. G. F. Herr, Yorkshire terriers; Miss Margarite Barron, Pekinese spaniels; Mrs. C. J. Lindgren, Chihuahuas; Mrs. Nat T. Messer, Airedale terriers; Mrs. J. A. Wiborn and Mrs. J. P. Norman, bulldogs; Mrs. N. H. Neustadter, Miss Macfarlane and Miss Kathleen Finnigan, Bostons; Miss Ethel Dean, French poodels, and Mrs. Horton Phipps, Miss Louise Easton and Miss Bates, bull terriers.

Hartman in "The Idol's Eye"

Ferris Hartman has mugged, joshed and jested through the light opera life of San Francisco for the past fifteen years in a way to win him the staunch admiration of a big wing of theatre patrons. Most of these admirers tried to squeeze into the packed Princess theatre last Monday evening to join in the ovation tendered the comedian on his home coming. They showered him with insistent applause, huge floral pieces, personal "jollies" and cheerfully demanded a speech at every curtain. The returned refugee, beaming with delight, hardly needed the provocation. He was bubling over, bulging with an accumulation of apt and timely jests and his speech-making was a rapid fire gun display of Hartman witticisms. He has written so many topical songs and pelted gags about the stage so often that he is a past-master in shooting timely jests straight to the funny bone of a Princess audience. It was the same Hartman—years have demonstrated that he cannot be anything else—the same romping, rollicking Hartman, a little mellowed perhaps. His voice still passes as a joke with him and leaves him dependable on his antics, the same easy going, free for all ways of raising a laugh, and judging from his reception, age does not wither nor custom stale them with the Hartman devotee. In one of his last curtain speeches, Monday evening, before he was carried off by a mob of enthusiastic friends to a hilarious congratulatory supper, he unconsciously gave the key-note to his method on the stage. "The difference between an audience here," he said, "and an audience anywhere else is this: Over in—well, where I've been—they sit back and dare you to make them laugh. Here in San Francisco the audience says, 'We're here for a good time. Turn loose.' I'm loose." And he was. He larded the libretto plentifully with timely hits all his own, he interpolated a string of topical verses and personal joshes that kept his friendly audience cackling with keen delight and he gamboled freely about the stage in hunts for the funny situation. Everything in the public eye became a target for his jests and sport. He took a shot at Heney by comparing the disconsolate "Idol" to the avid prosecutor, and the big audience laughed. His rousing reception put him in fine fettle and he ran the whole gamut of Hartmanisms in the raciest Hartman fashion. The management showed rare judgment in furnishing him "The Idol's Eye" for his reappearance as it affords the best scope to display his comicalities. The company became infected with the spirit of the occasion and the action went with a zip. The Hindoo story gave an attractive oriental setting with captivating costumes and color effects. Among other surprises in the cast was the grotesquely funny impersonation of the Highlander, Jamie McSnuffy, furnished by Walter Catlett. It was a conception of odds and ends adorned with shreds of apparel, animated with a pair of bedraggled legs and an occasional "Hoot mon!" His accent and appearance was a laugh. The vivacity and sparkle of Zoe Barnett, as the Nautch girl, was the gem relief work in the oriental picture. She and Sarah Edwards, as the Chief Priestess, carried the leading vocal numbers and rendered them excellently, the smooth contralto voice of Miss Edwards wining deserved encores. Arthur Cunningham was in his usual vigorous trim but the part of Don Pablo Tobasco proved narrow in vocal scope. Wallace Brownlow made the most of the music given him but, as in the case of Cunningham, he had scant opportunity. Evelyn Frances Kellogg looked her prettiest and sang sweetly. The chorus, the rich oriental settings and the glittering costumes were all that could be desired—and furnished Hartman one of the best backgrounds he ever enjoyed.

Strong Bill in Vaudeville

The Big City Quartette easily took the lead in popularity at the Orpheum this week, more on account of the excellence of their voices than because of their selections, which were of the old time order. The singers however captivated the house with their fresh, wholesome ways and sang with as much relish and enjoyment as any four bright chaps just out of college to earn their own living. Their rendering of glee songs had a rare and finished spirit. The four Rianos' acrobats, proved almost as popular. Two of them, garbed as monkeys, intersprsed nonsense and monkeyshines with clever and astonishing acrobatic feats. The real monkeys on the programme known as Raffino's Simians proved less attractive. However they were just off a long journey and may have been nervous. They offer several clever stunts, notably a burlesque disrobing act on the trapeze and a flying trapeze jump, but animals, like humans, have to exhibit surpassing cleverness these days in order to attract the attention of the volatile public. Fay Carranza, in her second week, displayed more poise and spirit and naturally her fine voice was exercised to better advantage. With a little more experience assured success lies before her. Neither of the two sketches offered will ever attain any notable niche in vaudeville. "Mr. Stung's Mistake" lacks action, snap and the other requisites to make it a breezy go in vaudeville. The skit of "Fix in a Fix," is almost as light and depends entirely on the efforts of Charles H. Bradshaw to rouse the attention. As he is inebriated most of the time the contest is unequal. The rest of the bill, winding up with a thrilling, hair raising motor car race in the moving pictures, was excellent. The accidents to several cars were almost as exciting as the real thing.

Return of "The Man of the Hour"

Mr. Cyrill Scott last seen in this city as the star of "The Prince Chap," comes back to San Francisco under special engagement to play the title role in "The Man of the Hour," and will make his first appearance in the role on Monday night at the Van Ness Theatre. This does not mean that this admirable actor is through with starring. On the contrary, he recently signed a five years' contract with Brady and Grismer, whereby he will soon go out again at the head of his own company. It has often been told how Broadhurst, in writing "The Man of the Hour," had young Scott in mind, but that the success of "The Prince Chap," which he produced in 1905, was so great that he decided to return "The Man of the Hour" to the author, who then turned it over to Brady and Grismer. At any rate, Scott ought to prove an ideal actor for the role of Mayor Bennett. That sterling California favorite, Miss Ethel Brandon, returns in the role which she acted last year—that of the Mayor's mother. Miss Ruby Bridges will again play the part of the Mayor's fiancee. Felix Haney returns in his amusing sketch of Jim Phelan, the get-even alderman, and Louis Hendricks will again be the capital actor of Big Dick Horrigan, the boss who brooks no opposition.

Popular Romance at the Alcazar

"Brother Officers" will be the Alcazar's offering Monday night, with White Whittlesey as the dominating figure, Lieutenant John Hinds. He made such a hit in this role at the old Alcazar that the play ran three weeks—and that, too, one year after it had been presented in one of the high-price local theatres by a New York company. Competent critics who witnessed both productions unhesitatingly gave the palm to the Alcazar and Mr. Whittlesey's work. The story treats of British army and social usage. Lieutenant Hinds, of humble birth and breeding, is awarded the Victoria Cross and promoted from the ranks for his heroism in the field, and in his new environment he commits many breaches of gentility, but never violates the code of honesty and morality. His only sincere friend is Lieutenant Pleydell, a young fellow who gets into the clutches of an unscrupulous Australian millionaire, who was formerly a London criminal. Hinds recognizes the man in his true character, and threatens to expose him if he does not relinquish his grip on Pleydell and abandon his purpose of marrying an aristocratic girl, for whom, bye the bye, Hinds himself has a tender attachment. Having saved his friend, he is seriously thinking of declaring his love for the girl when he inadvertently overhears such a proposal discussed and unqualifiedly condemned by some of her relatives, so he buries his ambition and goes to India on active service.

As the hero from the ranks Mr. Whittlesey will unquestionably give the best characterization he thus far has presented his San Francisco admirers this summer. Whether as the blundering, bashful novice in society, hardly able to realize his social elevation, or the easy-going officer who has overcome the novelty of his social environment, he holds the interest of his audience. In the cast with him will be all the Alcazar favorites in well-fitting roles, and Stage Director Butler is seeing to it that the pictorial side of the play will be adequate.

To Produce "The Toy Maker"

Ferris Hartman has no reason to complain of his reception at the Princess Theatre. At every performance during the week the theatre has been packed and Mr. Hartman, in addition to receiving an ovation on his first entrance, has been honored with innumerable encores and curtain calls. the Princess is a class A building or it never would have resisted the shock caused by the salvos of applause. Of Mr. Hartman it may be truly said that age cannot wither nor custom stale his infinite variety. His performance of Abel Conn, a magician in "The Idol's Eye" retains all its delightful, quaint humor and has if anything mellowed and improved with time. Sunday night "The Idol's Eye" will be given for the last time and next Monday night a magnificent production of the delightful musical conceit, "The Toy Maker," will be offered with Mr. Hartman in his famous role of Johanns Guggenheimer. The cast will include Arthur Cunningham, Wallace Brownlow, Walter Catlett, and all the Princess theatre favorites.

New Features at the Orpheum

The de Haven Sextette, a clever and interesting feature of which is Sydney C. Gibson, will be the headline attraction the week beginning this Sunday matinee at the Orpheum. They will appear in the terpsichorean operatta, "The Understudy," which is considered one of the best acts in vaudeville. The scene of the operetta represents a pretty garden where a fete is being held and Mr. Gibson, Miriam F. Carson, the Barrett Sisters, Florence Williams and Elsie Kreb introduce a variety of songs and dances and many changes of costume. The Four Baltus, Olympic Gymnasts, the recent sensation of Paris, London and New York, will be seen here for the first time. They are exceptional athletes whose grace, daring, finesse and skill entitle them to rank in a class by themselves. Eugene and Willie Howard, two phenomenally clever youngsters, will present their singing and dancing skit, "The Hebrew Messenger Boy and the Thespian." Dolesch and Zillbauer, the original Viennese street singers who were the first to depict the itinerant minstrel on the stage, will give us a taste of their quality. They have proved a great hit wherever they have appeared. Next week will be the last of the Big City Quartette, Charles H. Bradshaw & Co., Raffin's Simian Performers and the Four Rianos. A new series of Motion Pictures will terminate the performance.

Captivating Opera at theAmerican

"The Love Tales of Hoffmann," pronounced by critics to be the sweetest story ever set to music, will be the initial musical offering at the American theatre. This is the comic opera which created such a furore during the opera season in New York and which has just closed a most successful run at Idora Park. The music is characteristic of all that Offenbach has written. The opera opens with a prologue and Hoffmann, a young poet, is shown leading a drinking chorus in a tavern and in a spirit of fun he is persuaded to amuse his fellow revelers by telling about his three love affairs. The stories are enacted in three acts and the opera concludes with an epilogue showing the poet in an intoxicated condition. As he lies thus sleeping, the muse of poetry appears and bids him to devote himself henceforth to becoming a great poet. Edith Mason, the charming prima donna, Thomas H. Persse, the sweet-voiced tenor, Charles Swickard, the baritone, Ann Tasker, the soprano, Bernice Holmes, the contralto, and Joseph Fogarty are a few of the artists who will sing the prominent roles. Popular prices during the engagement of "The Love Tales of Hoffman." Saturday and Sunday matinees will be given.

Auto Notes

On pleasant days Mrs. G. M. Wilcox of Fair Oaks may be seen on the roads of San Mateo County skillfully guiding her natty Thomas-Detroit Touring Car. Mrs. Wilcox is very much at home at the wheel and is a very enthusiastic motorist.

The family of Dr. H. D. Lawhead spent a few days in this city while on the way to their home in Woodland, Yolo County. Their tour lasted several weeks during which they visited all the seaside resorts south of San Francisco in their two-cylinder Buick touring car. The son of the family was the driver of the car.

Speaking about the automobile exhibit at the Idora Carnival, Mr. Mathewson last evening stated that while it was far from being a national show at the same time it indicated the trend of tire choice by the automobile public, Diamond Tires having equipped thirteen out of the sixteen cars exhibited.

MOTOR CAR CROSSING A RAILROAD TRESTLE

Latest feat in local automobile circles: A thirty horsepower White Steam Car crossing one of the long trestles of the Mt. Tamalpais Scenic Railway on its trip of six miles over the ties. W. J. Thomas, Superintendent of the railroad, is seated next to the driver and in the tonneau are San Francisco newspapermen. Mr. Thomas was amazed at the ease with which the big motor car traversed the route from Muir Tavern to West Point. The White car still holds the record for the Mt. Tamalpais climb.

J. B. Brokaw of Holly, arrived from Los Angeles in his '07 "D" Franklin. Mr. Brokaw spent four days on the road and reports an excellent trip with no troubles en route.

The Pioneer Company has already received deposits from a great number of parties for Chalmers Detroit Cars, among others W. R. Taylor of Florin, Nev., Edwin T. Huffman, and P. J. Garland of San Francisco, and C. Lehnhardt of Oakland, Cal.

The Consolidated Motor Car Co. reports the sale of both a Pope-Hartford Roadster and Touring Car to J. C. Kubach of Los Angeles, and also a Pope-Hartford Touring Car to Mr. Bert Dingley of Modesto.

S. S. Freeman of Alameda in his Model "D" Franklin Touring car reports marvelous success. He has driven 12,500 miles over the roughest country, without any expense whatsoever from a mechanical standpoint, and with the original set of tires furnished with the car.

A. Schwabacher spent his week-end vacation driving his Buick "White Streak" through Marin and Sonoma counties. He is acquiring quite a reputation as a speed burner as upon the return trip he made a remarkable drive from Petaluma to Sausalito.

Mr. and Mrs. P. F. Herringer of Rio Vista, Solano County, are enjoying a camping expedition in the Truckee and Tahoe Lake regions. They travel in their two-cylinder Buick touring car in the tonneau of which is carried a complete equipment.

Cruise of the "White Squadron."

The "White Squadron," Northern Division, will make its first cruise on Sunday, August 30th.

This is not a naval bulletin, but an announcement that the owners of "White steamers" will hold an outing on that day, and take an inland cruise through the various scenic routes of Marin County. Only the first part of the cruise will be taken on the briny and that will be the ferry trip to Sausalito, where the squadron will rendezvous until the signal is given from the flagship to get up steam and get under way.

The first port to which the steamers will head is Mill Valley. From there the fleet will go over the ground swells to Redwood Canyon, where the fleet will anchor and take provisions aboard. The crews will be granted shore leave to visit the redwood forest, recently given to the government by William Kent, and the squadron will then set sail for Willow Camp, where preparations have been made for a public reception, and several contests of speed and manoeuvering will be engaged in by the various vessels of the fleet.

The return trip will be made along the Coast by way of Manzanita to Sausalito, where the cruise will end.

It is expected that over twenty steamers will take part in the "sail." W. J. Thomas of the Mount Tamalpais Railway, will act as pilot to the squadron.

of an aeroplane. This was the first notable departure from the idea of a drifting gas bag, "a lighter than air" vessel. Other nations quickly seized the idea and followed it up with new and original models. Box shaped kites, cellular aerodromes, aeroplane freaked shaped things that would float in the air under certain conditions dotted the skies in Europe and America, and were claimed by their enthusiastic inventors to be the keys destined to unlock the secrets of aerial navigation. American inventors made rapid advances along the aeroplane line. For years the Wright brothers secretly experimented with a light broad surface body, similar to a sheet of card board, as it slips and slides through the air when dropped from a height. Bit by bit from this idea they evolved their present aeroplane, which is said to be the most successful invented to date along this line, just as Zeppelin's rigid balloon is conceded to be the best along the line of dirigible gas bags.

In appearance the Wright aeroplane really resembles nothing so much as a great box kite, consisting of two parallel planes forty feet long and six and a half feet wide, made of muslin on spruce frames. Between them and just under the upper plane is a motor which drives the propeller, which is in the rear, six feet behind the disks of the planes. There is included an arrangement by which the driver directs the machine's course by raising or lowering the edges of the planes and by shifting the direction of the propeller. There is also a rudder at the front which may be shifted to aid in steering. Below the framework and toward the front is a "skid" similar to runners on sleds. This is used for landing and differs in this particular from the French machines, which are equipped with wheels.

One of the hardest problems confronting the navigators while trying to sail these two-plane surfaces through the air was the apparently simple feat of changing the course in mid air without upsetting. The Wright brothers spent a long time over this problem. They claim they have solved it with a simple device. In the delicate manipulation of the rudders and wings lies the wonderful success of the Wright machine. Wilbur Wright is now near Paris showing the French inventors what his machine can do. He claims that in trials along the Atlantic seaboard he has flown more than three times the distance made by the best French machines. He believes that he has an aeroplane that will remain in the air as long as the fuel in the motor holds out.

Professor Bell, inventor of the telephone, declares that machines built along the lines of the aeroplanes secure their high speed at the expense of stability. He says it requires the greatest concentration and presence of mind as well as skill for its effective operation, and mistakes are likely to end in serious results, especially in the experimental stage when the operator is coping with wind gusts and the vagaries of the machine. Accordingly he has returned to the development of his idea of the cellular aerodrome. This consists of over 5000 silken cells in tetrahedral form. The cells have a six-inch base line and are framed in thin slits of wood. Instead of having two plane surfaces; as in the Wright machine, the aerodrome is virtually a bank of cells. When completed it is about forty feet long and eight feet deep. The operator sits in the center and has propelling machinery at hand, as in the cases of the Wright and the Herring machines.

Herring's machine will be one of the three to compete with the Wright machine in the United States government tests now being held at Fort Meyer. It is different in appearance from the Wright aeroplane, being more delicate and smaller. The efficiency of the surfaces, propellers and motors has been brought up to a point where a comparatively Lilliputian affair in the air will carry substantial burdens. Herring sees the day when aeroplanes will carry twenty passengers. He is the only man so far who has developed a fully practical automatic equalibrizing device. It is based upon a certain regularity in the seemingly wild and unruly wind disturbances. These have their origin in an eddying motion in the air, their impulses on the machine are always double and opposite in direction. Herring was the first to discover this eddying character, and he happened to strike, in practice, on a system of playing one impulse against the other, thus mutually neutralizing both. Herring certainly is among the leaders in getting the most power for the weight out of motor machines to be used in the air. Among military men his machine is looked upon with favor.

Zeppelin's airship attracted world wide attention this month by its remarkable flight in circling Lake Constance, and its untimely end by burning just when it seemed certain that its inventor would win the large reward offered by the German Emperor for a test flight. Fire and explosion are the great objections offered against these dirigible balloons. Zeppelin's airship and "Patrie," the most successful airship of the French government, were destroyed "accidentally" by fire. Zeppelin's balloon differs from all other dirigibles in that it is rigid, an idea of his own. It is cigar shaped and consists of a strong aluminum frame, over which is stretched a covering of silk, some 420 feet in length, with a diameter of about forty feet. Special compartments are built inside the frame for holding a series of linen bags, each containing hydrogen. About 400,000 feet of gas are used. The construction of an outer envelope provides a smooth surface and protects the gas bags from injury and from undesirable variations in the temperature. The cars are attached, in each of which is a motor of some twenty horse power, working propellers. Vertical and horizontal screws also work for movements in corresponding directions. A sliding weight is used to raise or lower the front of the balloon. The airship carried thirteen persons in its experimental flights, was completely under control and made fifty-five miles an hour, going with the wind. In this Zellepin dirigible many German publicists see the idea of an airship that will give that country the supremacy of the air, just as England now claims to possess the supremacy of the seas.

Already an Aero Navy League has been formed which has undertaken the organization of a fleet of dirigible balloons, armed and equipped like seagoing vessels. Germany has bought all rights to an aerial torpedo to be fired from ships, fortresses or dirigibles. Count Zeppelin has had a million dollars placed at his disposal for the purpose of building several airships along the lines of his recently destroyed rigid balloon.

Spurred by this activity in foreign war departments, the United States government has just set aside a million dollars to equip a new station for aeronautics near Omaha. Experiments are going on just now at Fort Meyers testing the respective merits of Baldwin's dirigible balloon and the aeroplanes of the Wrights and Herring.

at the sight there was a roar of laughter from every floor. She wiped her face with the back of her sleeve, and then took up her harp and went away. We could see that her shoulders were shaking with sobs."

"'The cowards!' growled Pollnitz, ashamed of his cruelty. 'Come let us follow her.'

"We slipped on our wraps and hurried down the stairs. The old woman was walking slowly on before us, bent under the weight of her harp. Pollnitz went up to her, and hat in hand, spoke to her. 'Let us relieve you, madam, and permit me to go along with you.'"

"She looked at us with her dead eyes without saying a word. With the most natural air in the world, Franz took the harp on his shoulder. Finally we arrived at her lodging. I do not remember ever to have seen such a wretched place. Imagine, if you can, a bare garret containing the strangest selection of bottles, rags and old papers. Along the wall, near a filthy mattress, a row of empty bottles was set symmetrically. A rickety stove occupied the center of the room. It could not have had a fire in it for ages. The atrocious odor was almost too much for me, I had to make an effort to force myself into that den.

"'Wait for me here,' Pollnitz whispered in my ear, 'and let me have a couple of marks, for I haven't a penny left.'

"I handed him my purse. It was light enough. The old woman say my action, and it seemed to arouse her. 'Bring some brandy,' she said in her worn-out voice.

"I did not want Franz to think me a coward, so I remained alone with the old witch, but when my comrade had gone, I felt afraid. 'What do you do, little one,' she suddenly asked me.

"'I study singing,' I replied, speaking loudly to conceal my uneasiness.

"'A singer, eh?' she replied. 'It is a poor trade, a nasty trade.'

"She grinned and something rattled in the bottom of her throat. I closed my eyes. The night was growing darker about us. All this misery suffocated me as if it were a horrible vision of my future.

"Pollnitz returned at last. He brought beer, charcoal and bread, which he laid on the stove. There was no table. The old woman watched these preparations with indifference. Suddenly her eyes lit up when she saw Franz draw from his pocket a flask of brandy. Swiftly she seized it and held it to her lips. We watched her horrified. Color came into her cheeks, and she smacked her tongue.

"'Ha, that warms me." Then, in a voice suddenly changed, she said, as she pushed forward a poor chair: 'Sit down. My place isn't very elegant, for the times are hard; pray sit down.'

"Her tone and the gesture that accompanied it contrasted so singularly with her former words that Pollnitz and I looked at one another in astonishment. I sat down. The shadow of a thought passed over the pale face of the old beggar. 'Will you give me your hand?' she said to me. She took my cold hand in her chapped fingers. 'You have a line of luck well marked,' she said, after studying my palm for a moment. 'Work, work. I too have known hope and, later, great success. I have been happy and made much of, mademoiselle. And this is what I am now!'

"A great wave of compassion came over me.

"'Yes, in the beginning it all looks natural and easy. And then, one evening, the applause falls away and your voice dies in your throat. The next day you drink a glass or two of champagne to revive your courage. Then your memory goes. Why have you that pain in your head? Why do the violins seem to be whirling around with the lights? You feel the thrust of the dagger there'—she put her hand on her heart—'at the first sound of a hiss. It is the beginning of the end. Are you afraid when you are in a tunnel, little one, in a long black tunnel? Ha, here is the tavern, where it is warm; the odor of beer is heavy among fumes of pipes, and smoke that chokes you! And at last it is all over, all over! You go straight ahead like a brute beast, you are hungry, you are cold. The police are pitiless, and the grating of the key in the lock hurts your ears. And the river is so dirty. It is all over, it is all over! Ah, glory!'

"I could not restrain my tears. Pollnitz was wiping his eyes furtively. The old woman lit a candle, and, fumbling among a mass of papers, she at last drew forth a faded photograph. She put it before us. It was an exquisite face, in spite of the old-fashioned costume of Selika.

"'That was me,' she murmured, and in the full light of the candle two tears rolled down her cheeks.

"Pollnitz and I regarded each other dejectedly. Suddenly a laugh broke the silence. The old woman had again set the brandy to her lips. Her face had once more taken on its bestial heaviness. The street singer had gone back again to oblivion, blessed oblivion. I emptied my purse on the table and Pollnitz and I fled."

The speaker was silent for a moment and then drew herself up slightly. "It was then that I formed the resolution never to touch a drop of wine. The specter of Defeat had risen at my side, it had held me by the hand. If it had not been for Pollnitz, I would have given it all up. Later, in those moments of dejection that make us ready for almost any cowardice, the image of that unhappy woman has risen before me, and I have once more braced myself against Fate."

"Did you ever see your protegee again?" asked the baron gently.

"I went back there a month later with Pollnitz. She was dead. It was then that we learned her name."

"Some unknown name, wasn't it?" asked Tiny Schoen, whose eyelids were growing heavy. "Some obscure chorus girl—"

"The street singer's name was Mathilde Wunder."

"Mathilde Wunder!" exclaimed Baron von Axius, in a choked voice. "Thilde! I can hear again the noises of that horrible night, the hisses in the theatre. Oh, what a horrible thing life is!"Yes," he resumed in an even tone, though he was very pale, "she had plenty of talent, but no sense of order. She had an agreeable voice—you remember her, don't you, Hamburg? But you could not have known her in her best days."

"Your story is stupid," said Tiny Schoen, yawning; "besides, what does it prove?"

"Nothing," replied the singer, with a sad smile.

Then Hamburg quoted in a low voice Heine's bitter words: "Be in no haste to condemn another, for who knows what end fortune has in store for you?"

PROHIBITION CLOSING HOTELS

The Hotel Virginia at Long Beach near Los Angeles was raided by the police, on a recent Saturday afternoon, for selling liquor, in contravention of the liquor law in that locality. The recent activity of the authorities in this and other similar cases has called forth a protest on the part of the hotel managers and some warm comments on the situation by the Los Angeles Graphic. The position of the hotel in the premises is stated by Manager H. W. Stanley in this manner: "We opened the bar for the convenience of our guests only. We had it located in an out-of-the-way-place, never advertised it, and allowed none but guests to visit it. As a result of the raid, the hotel and Long Beach as well, will lose the trade of some of the best people in the country. Two of the guests in the room when the officers entered went downstairs immediately, paid their bills and departed."

Says The Graphic: "The law, of course, is on the side of Chief Williams, who made the raid. But the incident shows what would happen in Los Angeles if the closed-town element, now so actively engaged in framing up a prohibition town, ever gets the upper hand here. Mr. D. M. Linnard, who conducts the chain of hotels of which the Virginia is one, is entitled to sympathy, even if the rabid prohibition element in Long Beach feels otherwise. The Casa Loma at Redlands, which he controls, is closed—we understand because the people of Redlands would not sanction a hotel permit such as the Glenwood has at Riverside. Now comes this blow at Long Beach. The Virginia is one of the finest hotels in the West; it caters only to the wealthy and well-to-do. A hostelry such as it is cannot do business on the coffee and doughnut plan. Its patrons come from a class that will get what they want—if not at the Hotel Virginia, Long Beach, then somewhere else. It may be that Long Beach will elect to raise the ban as Riverside has done, and thus enable Mr. Linnard to cater to a tourist travel worth while. If not, we can see the Virginia close its doors, and that at no distant day.

WENT AS FAR AS HE DARED

A couple of city men were playing golf when they saw an old gentleman looking at them wistfully. They asked him to join the game, which he did with alacrity. They asked him to speech and manner and played well. But once when he had made a foozle he ejaculated vehemently the word:

"Assouan!"

A few moments later, when he had made another bad play, he repeated:

"Assouan!"

The fourth time he said this one of his new made friends said:

"I do not want to be inquisitive, but will you tell me why you say 'Assouan' so often?"

"Well," said the old gentleman, "isn't that the biggest dam in the world?"

He was a Presbyterian clergyman.

New Novel by Gilbert Parker

Sir Gilbert Parker's "The Weavers" came just in the nick of time as a supplement to Lord Cromer's "Egypt." Though the author has expressly disclaimed having written a historical novel or drawn his characters from real personages, yet there are those who profess to recognize in the genial old statesman, Windlehurst, a resemblance to Lord Beaconsfield, while the two Randolph Churchills, father and son, are the prototypes of young Ellington, and the quaker youth, David, is General Gordon. So much for guess work. The author has admitted that the breezy American, Lacey, with his catchword, "Give my love to the girls," had his genesis in a traveler for a Chicago commercial house, who was just such another capable optimistic and seemingly inconsequent idler. The story shifts from England to Egypt and back again, and furnishes a wealth of incident and interwoven plot. David Claridge, a young Quaker youth, who went out to Egypt to take up the scattered threads of a dead uncle's business, in coming to the defense of a woman, a stranger, who, in her ignorance of Oriental ways, had committed an indiscretion. He took the life of a man, and though he was unsuspected he felt it incumbent on him, as a penance, to devote his life and exertions to the welfare of the country. The subtleties of the Oriental character are brought out in the conduct of the dead man's brother who has discovered the secret, and though he profited by the death and would have had no hesitation whatever about removing the man himself, characteristically saved up his revenge and bided his time. "The Weavers" cannot be disposed of in a paragraph, but Sir Gilbert Parker is too well known a writer to need introduction. Readers who have been inclined to regret his resolution to write no more of Canada and her affairs will have reason to rejoice that he has found so congenial a field elsewhere. Though Egypt is so far removed from American, "The Weavers" has made it very much alive, and it will be difficult to find any who, having begun the book, will lay it aside unfinished or who will not be inclined to look more deeply into the subject afterward. Published by Harper and Brothers.

Finds His Plots Around Him

F. Hopkinson Smith is somewhere credited with the saying that he does not have to invent plots and characters. He finds them ready made and to his hand and has but to relate the facts. One of his most popular novels is "Caleb West, Master Diver." Recently in "Everybodys," he related his connection and experiences with Captain Thomas A. Scott of New London, wherein will be found enough of the truth to explain what fiction there is in the romance. "Tom Grogan" is another novel which deals with the trials and triumphs of the civil engineer and constructor. Mr. Smith gives a graphic picture of "Tom," a capable and energetic Irishwoman who carried on her husband's business after his death. She is represented as in early middle age, but the author admits that he painted the woman he knew as she must have been at about that time. When Mr. Smith met her she was much older, and wind and weather and the strenuosities of her very complex occupation had left their mark.

A Beveridge Triumph

There is a child labor law in operation in Washington, D. C. It was enacted mainly at the instigation of Senator Beveridge, one of the most vehement and vociferous of the tried and true friends of the pee-pul, a statesman who is never so happy and felicitous as when vindicating his consuming affection for mankind and his sublime zeal for the interests of his country. In none of the many popular causes to which he has consecrated his high talents has he exhibited greater fervor than in that which is animated by a profound concern for the welfare of juvenile wage-earners. Senator Beveridge is above all things an ameliorator of conditions, and that is why he is one of the busiest men in American politics. A man of infinite sympathy, he goes about seeking those whose lot is susceptible of improvement, devising the while in his teeming brain ways and means of hastening the millenium piecemeal. It was in this altruistic spirit that he took up the question of child labor and solved it off-hand. The first fruit of his statute was tested by the family of Henry Talbot, aged fifty, a carpenter, employed by a railroad. He receives $2.70 a day for his services. He supports a family consisting of a wife, an aged mother, six children, two grandchildren and a widowed daughter-in-law. One of the children is an industrious boy named Theron, aged thirteen, who, during the summer has been working in a telephone booth and doing odd jobs which in the aggregate bring him between $3 and $5 a week. An ambitious boy, he expects to go to school next winter, and though giving most of his wages to his mother, he has been saving up to buy books. His work was light and wholesome, and it gave him pleasure because he knew it was enabling him to do some good in the world. When the child labor law went into effect this boy was the first to lose his job. For a time he was in distress. His ambitious hopes were crushed. But so absorbing were his aspirations that, ignoring the law, he went in search of work and obtained employment in an office building as an errand-boy. It is of such stuff that great men are fashioned. Some of the most brilliant names in American history are the names of men whose best qualities were developed in circumstances similar to those which we have pictured in our brief narrative of young Talbot's experience. But this brave, industrious lad is not to be permitted to school himself in adversity, to put his young faculties to the most congenial use and to avail himself of opportunities for bettering his condition and attaining the desirable goal. For insisting upon running errands he was arrested, and so was the janitor who gave him employment. Such was the triumph of the Beveridge law. Young Talbot may be too strong-minded to be turned from his career in this manner. But a great weight of discouragement has been put upon him. As for Beveridge, he will presumably take a fresh start and enact a few more panaceas into statutes. The ameliorator will not be denied.

A Typical Attorney-General

All those newspapers that are engaged in undermining public confidence in the courts have been exploiting the remarks of Attorney-General Hadley of Missouri in derogation of the decision of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals in the Standard Oil case. Of course Attorney-General Hadley's views on this subject are not of much consequence, for he is a lawyer of mediocre ability. This we do not infer from the mere circumstance of his being an attorney-general, though it is almost prima facie evidence, for men of great ability are seldom found in that job. The average attorney-general is nothing more than a political job-chaser who is more skilled in the art of cajoling the people than in the science of law. It is a good job for the young practitioner in quest of experience, but nowadays it has no charms for the lawyer of ability. That Attorney-General Hadley is a lawyer of no ability is evident from the fact that he advocates the enactment of a law "to the effect that no judgment in a criminal or civil case should be reversed unless the court could affirmatively say upon the entire record that the judgment was for the wrong party and that but for the error complained of a different judgment would have been rendered." These are the words of a lawyer with less than a spoonful of brains. Any lawyer of ordinary intelligence knows that it may be absolutely impossible for a court, after reading the record in a case, to say that but for an error complained of, a different judgment would have been rendered. The reason is obvious, we venture to assert, even to our own middle-aged and still rising City and County Attorney or even to our lightweight Attorney-General. Often the error complained of is a ruling by which evidence is excluded. How can any human being say what effect evidence will have upon a jury? The only way to ascertain is to permit the evidence to go to the jury. The function of the trial judge is to decide whether under the rules of evidence the testimony offered is admissible, and the function of the appellate court is to decide whether the trial judge complied with the rules of evidence. The absurdity of the change proposed by Attorney-General Hadley is exemplified in a case recently sent back to Judge Dunne for a new trial. It is the case of a man charged with murder. Judge Dunne refused to permit him to introduce testimony showing that physically he was much weaker than the man whom he had killed, yet at the time of the homicide the defendant was an emaciated invalid and his victim was a very powerful man. Moreover, at the time of the homicide the deceased was sitting astride the defendant's prostrate body and brutally beating him. It may be presumed that if the jury had been permitted to hear all the facts it would have rendered a verdict of acquittal. But nobody can say authoritatively what that particular jury would have done. Judge Dunne is doubtless of the opinion that he should not have been reversed in spite of his gross violation of an elementary rule of evidence designed to safeguard human liberty and human life. And as Judge Dunne's career on the bench is marked by a long series of reversals he probably feels as Attorney-General Hadley does about the advisability of indulging ignorant trial judges in the commission of error.

Government by the People

"If the direct primary is wrong," says Governor Folk of Missouri, "then government by the people is wrong." Governor Folk is in error. The direct primary is wrong when it is employed to render negligible the constitutional mode of electing United States Senators, but for many purposes it is all right. As for government by the people, there is no such thing in the literal sense of the term. The term is misleading. Its tendency is to give the people an erroneous and mischievous impression. In the hands of the demagogue it is a very dangerous weapon. A government by the people in the sense in which the term is technically employed is a government in which the sovereignty resides in the people. A government by the people in the sense in which the demagogue employs the term is a simple democracy, a government of the majority conducted in such a way that the will of the majority may be rendered effective at any time. The founders of this Republic had no intention of establishing such a government. They knew it was neither feasible nor practicable. And they were pretty wise statesmen. Read today the works of Jefferson, Hamilton or John Adams and you will see that they made an exhaustive study of the science of government. Furthermore, you will see that what they intended this country should have was the representative form of government, the shadow rather than the substance of majority rule. Those learned statesmen were sensible of the inherent weakness of a scheme of government in which there are no checks on the passions of the people. They were not experimenting with new theories. With the British system as a model they established a Republic on principles that had been tested. As John Adams said when discussing the Constitution, "The nature of monarchy, aristocracy and democracy, and the advantages and inconveniences of each were as well understood at the time of the neighing of the horse of Darius as they are at this hour." There were bryaniac demagogues in those days telling the people it was up to them to decide whether they should surrender to the aristocracy. And the Founders took up their pens and argued the impracticability of a government by the people in the demagogic sense. In pamphlets and newspaper articles they preached the importance of checks and balances of government, of raising the judiciary above the atmosphere of popular passion and of establishing an Upper House of Congress which would not be subject to the dictates of the mob. And yet in those days they had no prescience of twentieth century conditions. They had not the power of looking into the seeds of time. There had not been adumbrated for their guidance the march of socialism across the seas, nor the swarming to our shores of millions of illiterates from the slums of Europe. But they were familiar with the shortcomings of human nature. They knew that power unchecked in the hands of the majority must lead to injustice to the minority and to dissolution. Educating the people through the press in the hope of effecting popular appreciation of the Constitution and bringing about its adoption, they adduced innumerable historical examples to prove that the people, however enlightened, cannot be depended upon to govern themselves properly. The demagogues of the day asserted that only in pure democracies the people enjoy perfect liberty. The founders denied that there had ever been any pure democracies. "From the awful frightful pictures of a democratical city drawn by the masterly pencils of ancient philosophers," said Hamilton, "it is supposed that such governments existed, but there is no historical record of such a commonwealth in ancient or modern history." One of the dreamers of the day took occasion to remark that a society of gods would govern itself democratically, whereupon John Adams retorted that in so far as the classical deities are concerned, all the terrors of the nod and the thunderbolts of Jupiter with all his undisputed power were insufficient to hold them together. "This," said Adams, speaking of his own country, "is government by representation of the people in three branches, legislative, executive and judicial. If the people should ever aim at more they will defeat themselves." The Bryans and La Follettes of the country are now urging the people to aim at considerably more. They are urging the people to take the government into their own hands, to scorn the checks and balances which were designed by the Founders to protect the people against themselves.

The Irresistible Tide of Modernism

A writer in the New York Post discussing Modernism says that the Catholic Church must reckon "with the existing generation, and the generation behind that, and the next and the next to the end of time." The outlook for the Church, he thinks, is very gloomy. Beating back medernism, he says, is like "beating back the flooding tide." Furthermore, the laymen and clergy of the church, to keep abreast of the times, must attend the best universities, "and that implies a tincture of Modernism." The Church, this intellectual person tells us, "cannot subsist merely by an appeal to the unlettered masses." In short, if the Catholic Church holds out against Modernism it will go to the wall. There is no salvation for the church in old-fashioned religion. Modernism is the religion of culture, and it must prevail. The Post's intellectual editorial writer is probably a graduate of one of "the best universities," where he obtained a "tincture of modernism," and is therefore qualified to expound its verities. But it will probably surprise him to learn that there are other graduates of some of the best universities who are not convinced that Modernism has come to stay. Doubtless it will astonish him to learn that some of the most intellectual men of the Church of England, university graduates, are reactionaries in this matter, and that they are actually organizing a movement in the opposite direction, being enthusiastically in favor of getting behind St. Augustine, behind St. Paul, back to the simple Jesus, the Carpenter of Nazareth. They are concerned to maintain the substantial historicity of the Gospel outline. Now the Modernists don't care what becomes of the earthly and possibly mistaken teachings of Christ, nor with the evangelical narrative. According to the Modernists the Church is not bound by her past, nor is there any constant element in Christianity, beyond the influence of an idea. The most radical of them will have it that there is in the Church no authority invested with a supernatural stewardship of truth. Perhaps they are right, but will it strengthen the position of the Catholic Church to surrender its authority? A religion which makes no authoritative claim to human submission is no religion at all. And deference to authority is not in itself irrational. Ninety-nine hundredths of our conduct is in deference to authority. Granted that there is such a thing as revealed wisdom mediated to us through finite intelligence, is it so hard to believe that there may be somewhere on earth the voice of authority? We are not deciding these theological questions off-hand, but we are merely suggesting that perhaps the Pope and his cardinals, though they have not enjoyed the advantages of a course of intellectual training under a Wheeler at Berkeley or a Jordan at Palo Alto, are not such damphools as the erudite person who writes for the Post imagines. They have had some experience in theological and religious controversy. They are familiar with the history of all rationalistic revolts against religion, and they know, among other things, that each century is determined to construct its own philosophy as well as its own religion and theology; that every age attempts to formulate its convictions on the eternal problems of existence, and they know that were the Church disposed to trim its sail to every breeze that blows from the intellectual centers it would be soon swept out of existence.

A Censor Wanted

English critics seem to be seriously alarmed at the tendency of writers, and especially women, to produce books which deal with topics until comparatively recently not considered fit for public discussion. Granting the demands of "art" and the privileges of adult minds to be regaled with something more substantial than bread and butter, they yet consider the liberty now taken as skirting dangerously near to license, and suggest the advisability of making a voluntary halt before there arises a call for a public censor. The possibility of such an official being appointed is by no means unimaginable. Let a certain class of reformers take up the subject and clamor loudly enough, and the chances are that they will gain their point. England now is committed to an old age pension which, from the first, will require an expenditure of eleven and a half million pounds a year, and already there is a disposition to be dissatisfied because the age limit is placed at seventy years instead of sixty-five. The suffragettes are in a fair way to accomplish their purpose of securing "votes for women" because the average man feels ashamed of having the ladies make a public show of themselves. In our own land we have seen the abolition of the army canteen work havoc amongst the enlisted men, and the fanatics who are still celebrating that glorious victory recently came within an unpleasantly close margin of having the sailors deprived of their occasional cigarette. It seems now as if any coterie of old maids whose captious prudery reads into a harmless novel that which its author never suspected, can have the book removed from the shelves of a library supported by public taxation, and rarely does a month pass that some vice exterminator does not use his influence to have some art publication excluded from the mails or some book dealer arrested for keeping in stock a classic as old and as well recognized as literature itself. The disposition which once led to religious inquisitions and persecutions for heresy is by no means dead, but it is rather curious that it should be asserting itself at this particular time in England, where at this moment the people are preparing for the celebration of the tercentenary of the author of Areopagitica, the noblest piece of English prose, a plea for the liberty of unlicensed printing. The coincidence is especially curious inasmuch as Milton is the greatest Puritan in English literature. But nowadays, perhaps, the Puritans of England, like those of this country, are more familiar with the works of Hall Caine than with those of Milton. They revere the great poet for his piety, but few of them ever read his Paradise Lost. And fewer still are aware that he considered press censorship an abomination; that in discussing books he quoted Paul's "To the pure all things are pure," and added, "Knowledge cannot defile, nor consequently books if the will and the conscience be not defiled." Milton the Puritan is too much neglected. The study of him would serve to teach Puritans that Philisitnism is a crime, and that only the ignorant are intolerant of the joys of the living.

Prohibition and Blind Tigers

Reports from some of the States recently swept by the prohibition wave indicate that the inevitable reaction is already manifest. In Georgia there is profound disgust with the prohibition law; in Kentucky the complaint is heard that drunkenness has increased; in New Jersey the Sunday closing act is to be repealed. Everywhere that prohibition has been enacted it is seen that it does not prohibit; that it merely stops the sale of good liquor and greatly increases the consumption of forty-rod bugjuice. Wherever there is prohibition blind tigers are rampant, and there is nothing so conducive to delerium tremens as the alcoholic goods which are distributed through this beastly agency. In Georgia, which has been seriously embarrassed by the loss of the revenue formerly derived from the liquor trade, blind tigers are permitted to run at large, and semi-annually the dealers are led into the police courts, solemnly found guilty and fined exactly the amount of their licenses for the same period under the old dispensation. In New Jersey the Sunday closing law has been contemptuously violated and conditions exist that are a public scandal. In South Carolina prohibition has produced the same results that have been experienced in Georgia. But doubtless the Prohibitionists in these States are well satisfied with and proud of their achievement. They have at least made their influence felt, and to small minds this is a source of considerable gratification. It doesn't take much to please a mind of small dimensions. By a rattle a baby may be elevated to the seventh heaven of delight. But even a baby has a great capacity for mischief, and so have the Prohibitionists, as they have demonstrated by the abolition of the army canteen. The concrete evil that they do, however, is of little moment compared with the impetus which they give to the pestiferous principle that motives all the fanatical meddlesomeness by which individual liberty is being assailed in this country.

The most notable phenomenon incident to this campaign is the people's freedom from enthusiasm. This is probably because the people had so little to do with the selection of candidates.

The Man-to-Whom-One-Could-Not-Lie

By Edmond Haraucourt

Gregory was a young man of some twenty-one years of age, very loyal and somewhat sentimental, but idealistic and too much disposed to dreaming. Perhaps it was because of this that he became the hero of a very strange story. He met a fairy, a real fairy, one of those our grandmothers used to tell us about when we were children. He spoke to the fairy, delivered her from a great danger, and she granted him a wish. Believe it or not, just as you like; but here is the story:

Gregory was a landscape painter. He had very little talent, but was a hard worker. For two months he had been painting, and sometimes singing, in the exuberance of his happiness, in a little village in Brittany, not far from those forests which were formerly haunted by Merlin. He lived at an inn where he was treated with the greatest kindness, and he liked to talk to the simple people about him. In the evening, after supper, when all in the village had settled down into the silence of sleep, and all lights were out, he used to wander through the fields, and sometimes passed hours noting the colors of the sunset and the tones of the moonlight, enjoying the quietude and peacefulness, regretting at times that he would soon be compelled to return to the city, which he did not like, and take up again that life of lies, the outcome of our present civilization.

He felt this more keenly than ever the evening of the day before he was to leave, and, more melancholy than usual, he wandered about the fields in the moonlight and cursed the century in which he was born. Suddenly his attention was aroused by an extraordinary song. He could not tell whether it came from nearby or from far away, nor could he tell whether the notes were gay or mournful. Listening more attentively, it seemed to him to be a dance, lively but mocking; now and then he seemed to hear a cry of pain. Very much puzzled, he walked in the direction from which the sound came, and had hardly gone thirty steps when he came upon the singers. He remained motionless with surprise and thought that he was dreaming. He beheld a crowd of little beings, elves or gnomes, not taller than a shoe, who were dancing around in a circle holding each others' hands and singing as loudly as their tiny voices would permit. In the center of this circle there was a very pretty lady all dressed in white who seemed to be a prisoner, and was stopping her ears with her hands, acting as if frightened almost to death. When she saw Gregory she held out her hands toward him pleadingly. He rushed toward her, broke through the circle, and the frightened dwarfs fled on every side.

"They would have killed me, without your help," said the fairy. "I am grateful. Choose what you wish as your reward."

"Nothing, madame; I am only too happy to have been able to—"

"Kindly spare me this society romancing. I am a real fairy, and surely you want something. Speak and your wish shall be granted."

Certain people have a horror of being fooled, and still more of letting other people see that they are fooled. Hence Gregory, although he was not a very brilliant man, replied in a joking tone: "Madame Fairy, I would like to have this quality, that no one could ever tell me any lie."

"That is a very imprudent wish, young man," the fairy said, "and I would advise you not to make it. Still, I will grant it if you ask for it three times. Think it over." The fairy vanished again and Gregory, left alone, thought: "This is certainly a real fairy, and I will not have lost my time here if I can go back to town with the unique privilege of being 'the man-to-whom-one-cannot-lie.' What a splendid thing it will be to know the truth, the real truth."

A quarter of an hour later the fairy returned, and he repeated his wish. She shook her head. "Think it over, I warn you," she said. "I will not grant your wish until you have asked me the third time."

Perhaps the fairy, not being a human being, was not aware of the fact that the harder a thing is to get the more one wants it, so when she reappeared the third time, Gregory was firmer than ever.

"Your wish shall be granted," she declared. "You shall be the-man-to-whom-one-cannot-lie. Farewell. You will never see me again."

She disappeared and Gregory walked about the field for a long time, but did not see her again. He went back to his room in the inn, slept until morning, and then awoke. "What a strange dream I had last night! What could I have eaten to give me such a nightmare?" he said to himself, and then he began packing up. He nailed his pictures in a box, strapped his trunk and valise, and went down to the dining-room to take his last breakfast there. The daughter of the proprietor, Zelie, who, if not very beautiful, had certainly won his regard by her attentions and her efforts to please him, came in as usual and placed the coffee, milk, bread and butter before him. Then she said to him quietly: "Put that in your stomach, you hog, and I hope it will give you the colic."

Gregory thought to himself: "Zelie seems to be getting humorous this morning."

When he had finished his breakfast the porter, Louis, came to get his baggage; the painter wishing to help him carry the trunk downstairs, Louis dropped it suddenly on the owner's feet, grumbling in an apalogetic tone: "Take that, and limp! I did it purposely, you dirty plutocrat!"

Gregory thought again: "Louis is drunk this morning."

He went to the office to pay his bill to the proprietor, who for the past two months had treated him with the utmost courtesy. "It is about time you paid up," said the inn-keeper. "When I saw them taking away those damned trunks of yours I fancied that my rascal was going to skip without paying his bill."

"What cause had you to think anything like that?"

"Bosh, as if you wouldn't do it if you had a chance! All city people are scoundrels, but thank heaven we are rid of you now. Get out of here quick and come back next year and bring us some more of your money, which is the only thing we care about."

Gregory got into the carriage. At the door the inn-keeper, his wife and Zelie waved their hands and handkerchiefs to him, guying him extravagantly.

"What is the matter with all these people today? They have certainly gone mad," thought Gregory.

At the station he begged the railway porter to handle his box of pictures with the greatest care, and the fellow answered: "You bet your life I will! I'll put it under a dozen trunks that I happen to have in there, and smash it flat."

Gregory got into the car. In the compartment there were four passengers who were dozing in the four corners. One of them said to him in a very polite tone: "Could you not have found another compartment? Perhaps you thought we wanted your company?" Then turning to the others, he remarked: "Is he not the homeliest man you ever saw? He certainly looks like a calf."

When he arrived in Paris, he said to the uniformed customs officer who came to meet him: "In that trunk and that valise I have only my clothing, and here are the keys; in that box there are some paintings I have been making in the country."

"Open the box, you dauber, and let us see them."

"You mean to say that I must open that box which has already been half demolished?"

Castro and the Melodrama in Venezuela

By Donald Stern

For ten years past Venezuela has been in the limelight of the world on account of the dominating figure of one man, Cipriano Castro, President of the country by right of arms, a half-breed Indian, a cowboy cattle raiser, a renegado with a price set upon his head, yet a character so strong, so shrewd that he is able to defy the powerful influences of the asphalt and other trusts, and the countless plots of embryo revolutionists constantly striving to remove him and capture control of one of the very richest countries in South America. Behind the Monroe doctrine he snaps his fingers at the navies of the world.

To understand this melodrama of which Castro is the central figure one must know something of the country over which he holds despotic rule, a country containing 600,000 square miles of some of the richest land on earth, a land as large in extent as Germany, France, Italy, the Netherlands, Belgium, Switzerland and Ireland and drained by more than a thousand rivers. On account of its climbing altitude the land raises the produce of the tropics and the north and south temperate zones. It possesses millions of acres of rich, ungrazed, pasture lands, unexplored forests filled with the most valuable hard woods, and mines of all kinds of precious minerals of which immense asphalt deposits are by no means the least valuable. Its people are for the most part of mixed Spanish, Indian and negro blood; mulattos, mestizos and whites mix freely at all social functions, except in the most exclusive society. The natives lack the northern adventurous spirit; they are content with the living that comes with little effort. Is it to be wondered that a land so rich, so abundant in natural resources should constantly tempt the strenuous commercial adventurers of the day? The Venezuelans possess one exceedingly strong trait; they are past masters in intrigue and diplomacy and the exemplary of the nation is Cipriano Castro. He is called everything from the liberator of his country to an unconscionable tyrant. Around him are transpiring adventures as wild and romantic as any that happened in the days of the conquistadores or when the freebooters and swashbucklers ravaged the Spanish Main. The only difference is the actions are up-to-date and are clothed in the habiliments and laws of this commercial age.

By his friends Castro is hailed as the liberator of his country, by his opponents he is regarded as an insufferable tyrant.

The story of the asphalt trust alone forms a wilder melodrama than anything conceived by Richard Harding Davis and the other romancrs who have ventured into the South American field in search of material. It deals with a penniless American biscuit salesman who obtained a grant as large as the state of New York and containing some of the richest land in the world. Another chapter tells how a South American beauty, with the prestige of millions looted from Venezuela, went to Paris married a great title and queened it in society. And all the while that same country was being swept from end to end with revolutions and yielding up thousands of lives in bloodshed. It has been the land of fratricidal war. Seventy-nine revolutions occurred there in seventy years.

San Franciscans are particularly interested in this asphalt story because a number of them made fortunes very early in the game and before the tide turned in the affairs of this great commercial organization. The romance of the asphalt millions began back in the days of President Guzman Blanco. In 1882 there dropped into Caracas a hustling undersized biscuit drummer named Hamilton. Biscuits became a side issue with Hamilton as soon as his shrewd Yankee eye sized up the exceptional opportunities for capturing colossal grants in Caracas. Hamilton was the Columbus of promoters in a country of immense possibilities. Blanco belonged to that class of South American presidents who used their office to lard their own private coffers. His game was to make money while the sun shone. Accordingly he sold every government grant, license and privilege as soon as born and shipped the proceeds out of the country, mostly to France, where they remained on deposit against the day when he should be forced to flee abroad. Blanco had a daughter and a niece, both very beautiful. They had been educated in Paris and both looked forward to some day adorning society there. It so happened that the Duke de Morny had paid them marked attention and honors were even which would win him and grace the French capital. The drama had progressed this far when Hamilton happened into Caracas. In the interim of the first days of biscuit selling he made the acquaintance of the President's daughter and niece and also of the fact that he might make a handsome fortune if he could acquire the concessions of the natural products in the state of Bermudez. He broached his proposition to Blanco. The President was willing enough to sell them provided he could get the cash. He told Hamilton frankly that only the amount stipulated would bind the bargain. In this predicament there entered Blanco's daughter, the pride of his heart. She had heard of Hamilton's dilemma and she determined to take advantage of it to marry off her pretty cousin to the American and thereby make sure of the Duke de Morny and a life in Paris for herself. She succeeded in both her plans. Very adroitly she prevailed on Hamilton to press his suit, promising him the Bermudez concession as a wedding present. Very quickly he led his bride to the altar. With the concession in his pocket Hamilton had no difficulty in raising money with which to develop the Bermudez resources. He went to New York and interested several millionaires, among them W. H. Thomas. The Bermudez Company was formed and passed by degrees into the present General Asphalt Company with all its troubles, grievances and grubbers who became millionaires and millionaires who became grubbers.

Hamilton was the first man to break into the millions that developed with the asphalt game and his fate has overtaken many of those who followed him in pursuing the millions. Money deluged those who first promoted

Mrs. Oelrichs' Wealth

It is said that every time the report comes from New York that Mrs. Hermann Oelrichs is thinking of taking a trip to this city her friends become apprehensive. Some of them were discussing the latest report a few days ago when a wag remarked, "A few more trips and a few more real estate deals and Tessie will find herself in a tent in the park." But Mrs. Oelrichs isn't such a bad business woman as she is reported to be. The only time she proved a really "good thing" was when she sold the Lick House property, and that was at a time when she was bubbling over with disgust and wanted to sever all connections with her old home. As for the tent in the park, before reaching that humble position in life Mrs. Oelrichs will have to lose many more millions than she is credited with having. She can lose all that she inherited from her father and still be a very rich woman. Mrs. Oelrichs and Mrs. Vanderbilt inherited from their mother nearly fifteen million dollars, and nearly all that money was invested in gilt-edged securities which greatly enhanced in value after the distribution of the estate. Mrs. Oelrichs has kept a tight hold on her securities. A great deal of Senator Fair's wealth also consisted of securities, and these, too, have enhanced in value. In a few instances the enhancement was tremendous. Among the securities was some stock in an Ohio railroad that was appraised at $3,500. During the consolidation era when Mr. Morgan and other Wall Street magnates were getting control of the railroads of the country the Ohio stock belonging to the Fair estate was sold for nearly $400,000.

Anxiety Over the Coadjutorship

A clergyman who was recently in Rome has written to a friend in this city informing him that the apparent hesitation of the Vatican in the matter of the Coadjutorship of this diocese is due in a great measure to the intercession in behalf of Archbishop Riordan of certain distinguished American prelates who lately have had audience with the Pope. The writer says that the "turning down" of the Rev. Dr. Hanna had virtually been decided upon when a strong influence was brought to bear and representations made which gave the Vatican pause. The outcome is watched with keen interest by the Catholic hierachy not only in this country but in Rome, and the friends of Archbishop Riordan are deeply concerned as they feel it will be very humiliating to him to be told that his judgment in so important a matter has been at fault. But his friends hope that in the event of his choice for Coadjutor being repudiated it will be made to appear that the action of the Vatican is entirely due to the modernistic sentiments of the candidate. Meanwhile anxiety at the Cathedral is at fever heat.

A Brief Criticism

James M. Kerr, who recently thrust himself into the limelight with his annotations to the codes of California, in which, gratuitously, he overrules the Supreme Court, is not unknown to the local bar. He is the author of "Kerr on Fraud and Mistake." A leader of the bar was asked one day what he thought of this work. "The title," he said, "is all right!"

Hearst Lost and Found

Last week there were loud calls for William R. Hearst but no response. The distinguished founder of a personally conducted party was absolutely lost in the wilds of California. In vain he was sought over the longest leased wire and also over short wires unleased. The telephone was futile. Hide nor hair of him could be found. As though the jungle had swallowed him the evanishment of him was complete. Marius in his flight from Rome was not more inaccessible, and Hugh McIsaacs, Pacific Coast manager of the infant political prodigy was in distress, for Hugh had promised the people of Oakland a Hearst keynote speech, and Mr. Isaacs is not a promise breaker. But no man can schedule the Hon. William R. Hearst with impunity. Mr. Hearst is a man of impulses that are not easily harnessed. On Monday afternoon I walked into the Fairmont Hotel and lo! the lost was found, and without the aid of a decoy letter or any of the subterfuges of the gumshoe artist. There in the lobby was the man who seems destined to win the everlasting gratitude of his countrymen by saving them from the incorrigible incubus of Nebraska. It was a rather interesting spectacle that he presented. He was in the midst of a group of women and children, and it was evident they were all enjoying his company. Nobody talked politics. Mr. Hearst held a delightful informal reception, and had a fine time with the little ones.

Hearst's Letter

At the close of the reception Mr. Hearst went to his office and dashed off a little masterpiece of literature; an uproariously comic epistle to the maxpoppers of the Iroquois Club, informing them that he is no longer a Democrat and why. For extra dry, exquisite humor there are few things in the literature of American politics that are equal to this gem of the epistolary art, this good natured but mordant, flippant yet blasting, excoriation of the degenerate and abandoned party of Jackson and Jefferson. While the humor of it is best appreciated by those who are sensible of the solemn seriousness with which the pompous and tumid prophets of Democracy in the Iroquois Club take themselves, the subtle artistry of it appeals to all lovers of amiable satire. When Max Popper read the letter he gravely announced that the club would hold a meeting and formally read Hearst out of the party. This sentiment met with the warm approval of E. P. E. Troy, who said he was in favor of teaching Mr. Hearst a lesson and letting the world know that the Iroquois Club cannot be trifled with. During the day several taxeaters came in from the City Hall to express their indignation. And all the while Mr. Hearst was speeding overland all unconscious of the rod that was in pickle for him in San Francisco.

Harvey's Brilliant Financiering

The arrest of John J. Lynch for embezzling bonds of the Ocean Shore Railroad Company is of interest, indicating as it does the admirable perservance of Mr. J. Downey Harvey in financing his great enterprise and also the difficulties that he is encountering. When a man who is building a railroad which has terminal facilities in the heart of a great city has to borrow small sums of money from stock brokers, putting up forty thousand dollars worth of securities to get ten thousand in cash, the inference is warranted that such grass as is accessible to him is somewhat short. But reports from the fog zone inform us that men are laying rails, that others are grading and others are filling, and consequently it must be assumed that the treasury is in a flourishing condition. Mr. Harvey's experiment in railroad building is consuming a tremendous amount of energy, and everybody feels that the project, when consummated, will reflect great credit on the smart little man in whose teeming brain the brilliant idea of connecting Santa Cruz and San Francisco by a scenic railway was conceived. The financiering of this road is a greater feat than the acquisition of the terminal facilities and that was a coup that stands unparalleled in the recent history of San Francisco. J. Downey Harvey is the only man that outmanuevered Ruef during the Schmitz administration. He demonstrated that a social pull is sometimes more potent and effective that a sack. To be sure he put himself under obligations to Schmitz but to some temperaments obligations are as light as air and as easily dissipated as smoke.

Discouraged But Not Dismayed

That the financial problem is a serious one to Harvey is nothing more than should have been expected. Financial problems are common place affairs in these leaden days of industrial depression. Just before the fire there were no obstacles or difficulties to dismay the bustling projector of the Ocean Shore railroad. There was a plenitude of the medium of exchange in sight and within reach, and Harvey was looming up like a new, though abbreviated, Huntington when along came the fire and immediately thereafter the railroad project seemed to have passed into the domain of harrowing dreams. For a while nobody thought it a sufficiently plausible object to engage even the attention of a rainbow chaser., nevertheless Mr. Harvey did not lose heart. The fact is he couldn't afford to lose heart. A lot of his money had gone into the railroad, and as Harvey is no multi-millionaire, to him the scenic railway was more than a flyer in high finance. The Martin millions are not behind Downey. Altogether the members of his family have vindicated their confidence in his genius to the extent of $100,000. There is no more easy money coming to Downey from rich relatives by the legacy route, so the fire was a pretty severe blow to J. Downey. Much of the financial backing which he had reason to include among his assets in the halcyon ante-conflagration days, after the calamity in imponderable vapors faded from his view. I have been told he expected about $1,000,000 from the First National Bank. which expectation was justified by his friend S. G. Murphy only to be disappointed by that gentleman's successor. And after the fire there was less enthusiasm than formerly among the stockholders of the company. One of the most prominent of them, Walter Dean, sold out his stock and the defection of so wealthy a man was in itself. to say the least, most discouraging. But by this time Harvey was inured to affliction. Unlike Job he didn't sit around and lament. He had bonds to sell, and terminal facilities that attest his great hypnotic power, and he went bravely to work. And now the road is gradually stretching its weary, tortuous length along the frowning fronts of the fog-swept cliffs that echo old Ocean's melancholy roar, and the twentieth century Huntington in the marts of Mammon is blithely financiering. But the sceptics are still scoffing. Now that they see that genius cannot be denied they are asking, "What is he going to do with the road when it is built? Run it, of course; run it to Santa Cruz and back again.

"No, five sons-in-law have married on."

Boke Making a Touch

The Citizens League of Justice is not dead as some persons imagine. It is merely suffering from inanition, but the golden alimentary substance which the doctor ordered is being vehemently appealed for by the nurses, and the nurses have not lost hope. Prominent among these nurses is Boke of Berkeley. Boke is a lawyer,, but he doesn't work at his trade. He is a tutor in the university, and in his off hours makes a noise like a reformer. Boke is a man of prodigious industry. Stupendous tasks have no terror for Boke. When he isn't teaching the young idea how to shoot he is overruling supreme courts, or laying the foundation of an institution for the dissemination of patriotism. Boke is tireless. At present he is organizing a movement for the correction of public sentiment in the matter of the graft prosecution. A good, easy man, he is unaware that all moral movements have their oscillations and reach their culminating point as a pendulum moves to the end of its arc and then swings back again. Full of enthusiasm for his idea he is making a touch. Through letters addressed to putative patriots he is soliciting the sinews of war. Hearken to Boke: "The League plans a campaign to last for the war—during the life of the graft cases. It is a campaign for a great cause. It will maintain a center of information at 241-2 Pacific Building, issue material for the press, get out reports, publish a weekly paper (when the funds reach the mark), send speakers through the city, organize clubs of justice, plan a campaign through these clubs, and hold mass meetings. It will get a corps of volunteer citizens formed to attend the trials and give an honest citizenship color to the court room. It has started an organization which will include all the clergy of the city, who will cooperate in the work. It has other plans which will be known later. It will get results. It will stand on the platform of honesty and principle. It will endeavor to line up the city on this platform."

Color and Atmosphere

What immortal and dauntless courage breathes in the foregoing procession of Bokian sentences; what sublime patriotism, what glorious faith! Great is the League of Justice and magnificent is its prophet! A fine idea this is of organizing a corps of volunteer citizens "to give an honest citizenship color to the court room." The color scheme for a court room is something new and doubtless is will prove an excellent aid to justice, but it may not suffice. I would suggest a few properties by way of atmosphere. A rope in the hand of each member of the corps and a few miniature coffins scattered about would impress the jury far more than such applause as the honest claqueurs might be disposed to give the vociferous Heney in his characteristic moments. As for the mass meetings that are to be held I fear it will be pretty hard to find speakers with power of attraction. I don't believe you could round up a corporal's guard to walk across a street to hear Langdon bloviate, and as for Heney, the pride of the peons, he has become absolutely stale and unprofitable. It is easy to summon spirits from the vasty deep—but will they come?

As to the Clergy

Schoolmaster Boke tells us the "organization will include all the clergy of the city, who will co-operate in the work." This is somewhat vague. Surely Boke does not mean that all the clergy in the city will co-operate in the work. For, as a matter of fact, a very small percentage of the clergy will be found in the League of Justice. There will doubtless be found in the League all the sensational preachers who preach for publication whenever a subject of discourse is suggested by the editor of a yellow journal. But it is incredible that any of the genuine churchmen of the city, any of the clergy of true religious feeling will become identified with a movement that has for its purpose the hounding of men accused of crime and that frankly demands such justice as may be compounded of passion and intimidation. The fact is that in clerical circles there is already a great deal of skepticism with respect to this movement, behind which are men who have traduced the ministers of a religion, and who have done a great deal toward stimulating racial and religious prejudices.

Stung in the Hornet Mine

The recent sale of the Hornet mine in Humboldt county, Nev., recalls the excitement created by the sudden, extraordinary richness displayed in that property years ago and the amazement which followed when the truth leaked out. Charges of "salting," mine robbing, fraud, swindling, with a dash of pistol fusilades were tossed recklessly about over the Sage Brush state but the man who got away with something like $300,000 in the excitement was never caught, though several of the most able sleuths on the Coast took after him. They rounded him up at last but he outwitted them by an ingenious trick. In the early days of the Comstock lode when Mackay and Fair were just beginning to get within reaching distance of the bonanza millions, two mill hands near Carson began to tap an amalgam tank that was harboring the cream of some very rich Mexican ore then being milled. This Comstock amalgam was peculiar and almost any tyro could have picked it our from any lot of amalgams at a glance. In course of time the two mill hands had accumulated over $200,000 worth of the stuff and they began to worry over the problem of disposing of it at a profit. A man named Raines lived in Virginia City at that time, an ingenious metallurgist and a thorough mill man. Aside from these attainments he was one of the keenest rascals in the State. The problem was put up to Raines and knowing the two other scamps were in a hole he agreed to get them out for the lion's share of the swag.

Mad Quest For Hornet Stock

Raines knew every mine in the State, its condition and the condition of every mill. In Humboldt county there was a played out shaft called the Hornet mine. Its stock would have been worthless had it not covered an old five stamp mill nearby. This mill gave it a value of two cents a share. Raines bought up enough of this stock to get control of the mine and mill. Then another idea entered his scheming head and he bought up all the shares he could find. He put several shifts of miners to work and opened up the mine quietly and very confidently. While the miners were digging out any old kind of ore Raines made several trips to Carson in a specially rigged light wagon and brought the stolen amalgam to a cache near the Hornet mine. Then he started the mill on the Hornet ore and very adroitly fed the amalgam into the run. When those listless millmen saw the rich returns pour out they fairly gasped and messages were dispatched secretly all over the State to put up all the Hornet stock in sight and never mind the price. The demand for the stock kept increasing as people saw the remarkable returns being turned out by the mill. Raines, of course, took care to peddle out all his Hornet stock while the excitement was highest. He gave his partners their share of the amalgam proceeds and came down to San Francisco with his share of the clean-up—profits that netted him over $300,000.

His Trick on the Detectives

The genius of Raines might have placed him in time among the "Uncrowned Kings of the Commonwealth," afterwards collected by Historian Bancroft had he been inclined to go into real estate with his loot and grow up quietly with the budding millionaire, but swindling games proved too fascinating for Raines no matter how high his bank account. In this city Raines was hunted up by a perplexed promotor who had a hole in the ground which he wanted to sell for several hundred thousand dollars. For one-half the proceeds Raines showed him how the trick could be turned. In the wind up the promotor fell into the net of the Chief of Police and to save himself he tried to throw the blame on Raines. As usual, Raines, by the advice of his attorney, had kept well within the law. Unlucky for him Lees in following back over the old trail had run across his connection with the Hornet mine and the stolen amalgam. There were certain things in that transaction that Raines couldn't explain satisfactorily to the law and between suns he slipped into the southland. When the California and the Nevada detectives struck his trail again he was in Arizona. They raced after him with requisition papers. Raines liked the country and he didn't want to be chased out of it by a lot of trouble making detectives, so the time they consumed in reaching him he employed in winning the good graces of the United States Marshal of the district. When the detectives came in sight he had his friend, the marshal, arrest him on the trumped up charge of selling whiskey to the Indians. The detectives could look at him but they couldn't touch him as he was in the custody of the United States Government and there he conveniently remained till the case against the promotor and himself was settled by the courts. All the while, of course, he was living at the best hotel in the town, "out on bail."

Where Ignorance Is Not Bliss to Taxpayers

Is there anybody in the District Attorney's office with the ability to draw up a document in strict accordance with the form prescribed by law? This is no idle question propounded in a spirit of raillery, no flippant interrogatory pregnant with invidious innuendo, but a serious, straightforward query inspired by no other motive than that of ascertaining whether the intellect of an important municipal department is reeling hopelessly in Egyptian darkness or merely hibernating in penumbra. The answer to this question is of some consequence to the taxpayers of San Francisco. They are spending a great deal of money on the District Attorney's office; more each month than ever was spent in any two months in the history of the city prior to the advent of Mr. Langdon. They are not only paying Mr. Langdon for merely looking nearly as wise as an owl, but they are conserving his muscular force with an automobile which takes him to church on Sunday mornings and whither he listeth thereafter. Surely to expect this pampered darling of the populace to employ competent men in his office is not too much. Unfit himself to try a case, he ought to give the people, if not a Marathon, at least a little run for their money by selecting for his asssistants men who are able to draw an indictment. These remarks are all apropos of the Creely contempt case.

A Typical Conspiracy

The Creely case is now in the Court of Appeal. It was postponed the other day because nobody appeared for the District Attorney to argue for the confirmation of the order of the Superior Court committing Creely for contempt. Thereupon the Bulletin took the matter up for editorial discussion, and quoted one of Mr. Langdon's assistants, a Mr. Harrison, to the effect that was no occasion for his presence, since the only question is the sufficiency of the commitment, and that is a matter spread upon the record which the Court can very easily decide without argument. "Doubtless Mr. Harrison believes," says the Bulletin, "that the proceeding on Creely's part was commenced only for the purpose of delay and that the Court ought to act upon it, one way or the other without ceremony or further postponements." All of which the Bulletin knows is absolutely untrue. In this matter the Bulletin is aiding and abetting one of the contemptible little conspiracies that have been peculiar to the moral agents whose plans for self-aggrandizement masked behind a civic purity movement have miscarried largely as a result of their proneness to sinister expedients. The Bulletin knows that in drawing up the commitment in the Creely case the half-baked lawyers of the District Attorney's office were guilty as usual of egregious blunders. Even these half-baked lawyers now believe that the commitment is fatally defective. Their attention has been called to the matter and they have discussed it as freely as Hiram Johnson discussed and admitted the fatal blunders in the Schmitz case before they were passed upon by the Supreme Court. Whether the blunders in the Creely case are fatal I do not know, but I do know and so does the Bulletin know that the impression prevails in Langdon's office that they are fatal. If Mr. Harrison doesn't know it is because nobody thought it worth while to inform him. It is a matter of common notoriety, however, that Langdon was unrepresented in the Court of Appeal because of the blunders in the commitment and because it was conceived to be a smart trick to affect an attitude of indifference and thus convey the impression that the points involved were of no consequence. This attitude was in furtherance of a malevolent design to supply a pretext for the villification of the Court of Appeal. But even though the purpose had not been disclosed by the gossips of the District Attorney's office, it would have been perceived, for the prosecution should always be represented on appeal, and it is never so eager to be represented as when it has a good case. When a lawyer abandons his case it is not because he knows he has no chance of losing.

The Honduras Exile

Not until some of his creditors are paid in full will Bob Mitchell be permitted to return to San Francisco. Among some of them there is no lack of Christian charity. They know he has suffered and paid the penalty of his transgressions, and they have no desire to prolong his misery. But there are a few of Mitchell's creditors who demand their pound of flesh, and the exiled defaulter is unable to reimburse them. Not, therefore, unless his friends come to his rescue can Mitchell come back without fear of prosecution. But Mitchell has friends and I hope to see them come to his aid. For Bob Mitchell, pining in exile in Honduras, eagerly watching for encouraging letters from home, indulging the inspiriting hope that he may be forgiven, is to me a most pathetic and piteous figure. Until the crash came in Mitchell's financial affairs there was probably not a man in San Francisco who could truthfully say that the broker had ever done him an injury. Bob Mitchell has good stuff in him. Before becoming a broker he practiced law in this city for many years, and in all his relations with the members of his profession, with his clients and his acquaintances he proved himself a man of the highest integrity. His intimates knew him to be a man of big heart and warm sympathies. When he failed in business the greatest loss was his own. He embarked in the brokerage business with a fortune of over $100,000, most of which came to him from the Fair case. When he started for Honduras he was almost penniless. What little money he now has he made in Honduras, for he has been successful there in the real estate business, and I am told that he has many friends especially among the highest government officials. The report that he has sought a compromise with his creditors on account of the extradition treaty is without foundation. The Honduras government will never permit his extradition.

Will Become a Professional Actor

Emory Pottle, who achieved considerable newspaper fame through his magazine stories designed to teach his ex-wife, Juliet Wilbor Tompkins, what ideal love and wifely devotion should be, has quit the magazine field for the nonce and will essay a flight into the realm of pure acting. He has just been selected by his brother novelist, Booth Tarkington, to originate the leading role in the latter's new play "Foreign Exchange," to be produced in New York in December. Mr. Pottle made a record of three stories in the August magazines but this is his first attempt for a record on the professional stage. He has made his bow in amateur theatricals in a number of well-known New York homes whose rich owners incline to that form of amusement. For some time past he has candidly said that he would drop writing if he could be assured of a good part on the stage. His friend Booth Tarkington sympathized with his ambition and hunted the opportunity for him in this last production. The new play deals with the question of international marriage and the author's attempt to prove that the American girl cannot be happy with the foreign husband she has paid for. The scenes are laid in Paris. The part assumed by Mr. Pottle demands a blond hero six feet tall.

Aired Their Troubles in the Magazines

The Tompkins family of San Leandro was widely known in California long before Juliet Wilbor Tompkins determined to go East and enter the literary field on her merits. She was one of the first California society girls to win distinction there and thereby paved the way for several others. She had written many clever magazine stories and was one of the editors of Munsey's when she met and married Emory B. Pottle, at that time of the "Criterion." The marriage of the young editor was made much of by "Us," a bright Miss Bohemian clique in New York, to which Miss Tompkin's sister, Elizabeth Knight Tompkins, Gelett Burgess and a number of other Californians belonged. Cupid lived with them awhile then he slipped away and they parted. For a time they attempted to give their explanations of the dissension through the stories they published in the magazines and the reading public was considerably amused by this original method of airing family feelings. Finally came the day when new plots covered the old wounds and the case was buried in the back numbers of the magazines.

California Writers in New York

Gossip regarding the California newspaper colony settled in New York reports them all in a flourishing conditions. The Wallace Irwins have just returned from a summer vacation on the continent, have a handsome flat, and are doing a deal of entertaining in the swagger Bohemian circles. Bailey Millard is conducting a school for journalists with incidental successful flights into the magazines on his short stories. Harry Chambers is still doing editorial work but his wife, (Mary Davidson in the days of her art work here on the Examiner) has relinquished the success and remuneration she enjoyed on the Sunday World by illustrating her clever interviews with prominent people and is now devoting herself entirely to painting. She has a beautiful studio, which is on the regular calling route of the best known people in the Manhattan art colony. "Bob" MacKaye has quit Success magazine for a handsome offer to take charge of the Delineator. Charley Michelson has been promoted to a fancy editorial position on the Hearst editorial staff. Bob Davis is enjoying himself among the Thousand Islands in the St. Lawrence and acquiring more steam to force good things into the Frank A. Munsey publications, part of which he is managing.

Teacher—"If you are kind and polite to your playmates, what will be the result?"
Scholar—"They'll think they can lick me!"

Selected the Cook Himself

In the Bohemian Club they are telling a good story about one of the married members. His wife lost her ideal cook through marriage last spring and for some time past she has been having a vexatious time seeking vainly for a substitute. She tried out several applicants during the past month and finally became reduced to that condition of frazzled nervousness which affects the ordinary husband's comfort. He realized that it was up to him to do something in order to escape a trying period of household unrest. Clapping on his hat one day he announced in an authoritative way that he was going to settle the cook question at once and by himself. At the agency he passed in review a number of prospective pot boilers who were gently herded his way by a demure manager. One objected because his servants' quarters did not contain a library; another because she expected all her evenings out. Finally becoming somewhat nettled he turned to the manager and said, "This is too slow a method of finding a cook. The face is everything. I pride myself a great deal on being able to read the character from the face. The applicants that I examined all lack the facial qualities that denote obliging and courteous cooks." Then his eyes roved enquiringly about the room till they rested on a middle aged, quietly attired woman, seated near the private office door. "Now, there is a woman," he said, brightening, and indicating the sitter. "That woman I am confident will fill the bill. Her face indicates it. Send her up to the house. I won't haggle about the wages." The countenance of the manager beamed. "Yes," she smiled," that lady is certainly a good housekeeper, but she is waiting for a cook herself; that is Mrs.—" and she mentioned the name of one of the best known chatelaines of Ross. The clubman fled but the story pursued him, and nobody enjoyed it more than the Lady of Ross.

An Indictment Against Fashionable Society

Joseph Medill Patterson's book, "A Little Brother of the Rich," will doubtless have a large sale. It is sensational to a degree, and should appeal to such appetites as were gratified by "Three Weeks." Mr. Patterson presents a picture of New York society and incidentally of the stage which is a little too nasty and revolting for description. But, of course, the author represents that to be universal which is confined to the narrow circle in which he moves. According to Mr. Patterson every fashionable woman drinks to excess, is untrue to her marriage vows, is animated by absolutely no thought of anything except vulgar display, the gratification of animal passion and insatiate greed for money, and cares nothing for the means by which money is obtained. This is the indictment of a man who is not over-scrupulous in his assertions. It will probably be less painful to the people about whom he has written than the members of his own family. For Patterson is related to a dozen of the richest and most prominent families in the United States. If there are no decent persons in fashionable society then Patterson should be ashamed of his own relatives.

Miss Gaysett—Oh, mamma! what a nice, sensible, decent-looking young fellow that is over there!

Mother—Hush, child! It must be a waiter.

"Wet Winter," Say the Beavers

Ed Berg, who has just returned with several companions from a long auto hunting trip through Trinity county, says that the hunters, trappers and cattlemen in that section all report a severe winter coming. They base their forecast on the housekeeping actions of the animals and wild fowl. Bears, beavers, ants and squirrels are all hustling in a way to show that they want to get out of the wet. Beavers, ants and squirrels are laying up provisions in high places and are garnering extra quantities. Sierra lumbermen say that "big winter" signs are observable in the mosses and other barometric vegetations. Hunters of wild fowl in Northern California have made a like prognostication for several months past. Singularly, too, many old residents along the base of Mt. Tamalpais, in Mill Valley and Larkspur, are beginning to talk of a particularly stormy winter because they have not experienced such a cold, damp summer in many years past.

Figuring on the Campaign

Ballot wizards are figuring that at the election this Fall some 14,000,000 votes will be cast for Bryan and Taft alone. Ordinary pencilers however are not figuring that many conscientious voters are feeling very bitter on the way both conventions were dominated by one man power and will refrain from voting. Shrewd managers on both sides are reported cognizant of this feeling and are planning to exercise all their arts to attract this "silent" vote. Manager Hitchcock, of the Republican machine, has the greater resources and has developed an elaborate system for this purpose. Tradition will be knocked in the head in handling the campaign, just as it was in handling the conventions. Money is ostensibly tabu because public sentiment is strongly against big campaign contributions just now but money will be used and used plentifully for the simple reason that the campaign managers must have it to spend, just as the ordinary business man must use it to attain his ends. A prominent member of the Republican State Central Committee declares that $2,000,000 can be put into national campaign oratory alone and hardly make a showing. Then the clerk hire at headquarters eats up money by the bucketful. At the Republican National Headquarters last year postage alone cost $150,000 and postage was only a drop in the clerical expense. The daily average was 5,000 letters a day to be answered.

Cost of Educating Voters

Campaigns of recent years have progressed away from the lines followed by the managers of twenty years ago. There is very much less of the whoop-la, red fire and torchlight parade business. The last very great street parades ended the campaign twelve years ago. Uniform marching clubs are now relegated to jay towns. Efforts are now concentrated on the straight hard work of educating the voters and trying to make the individual ballot caster see the issues of the campaign in the desired light. Only two practical ways have so far been developed to do this: campaign oratory and literature, in the form of documents, pamphlets and working the proper articles through the daily press. Bureaus handle both classes of work with the executive committee directing all the moves. The best speakers this year will be held down to $150 a week and their expenses. The others will get much less. By far the largest number will speak for their expenses alone, trusting to receiving some party office as a reward. Even with such small sums expended for individual speakers the aggregate is enormous and the amount will quickly run into several million dollars, no matter how tightly handled.

Not Such a Singular Honor

Judge Maurice T. Dooling of Hollister, the Bulletin tells us, "has just received a singular honor." He has been nominated by the Republicans as well as by the Democrats of his home county for Superior Judge. This is not so remarkable an honor as the Bulletin would have us believe. There are not many lawyers in San Benito County. It is one of the sparsely settled counties of the State, and in that county there is no competition for the honor which was bestowed on Judge Dooling. When a similar honor is bestowed on a man in a town of the size of Stockton or even in a town of the size of San Rafael, the recipient has reason to be proud. The practice of removing judges from the field of partisan politics is one that has found favor in some of the large cities of America, and this year the judges in several towns in this State have been nominated by the two leading parties. Across the bay in Marin County Judge Thomas J. Lennon, one of the ablest young jurists in the State, has been endorsed by both parties, and in that county there is some competition. But it is not a singular honor in Judge Lennon's case because Judge Lennon has no past to be overlooked. It is inconceivable that Judge Lennon would preside at the trial of the Bulletin's editor after learning that it was a purely theatrical affair instituted for the benefit of the defendant.

Twain's Idea of Prohibition

"Crossing the Atlantic with Mark Twain last summer," said Mrs. Francis Williams, "I asked his opinion of the prohibition law. His reply was very characteristic, very humorous. 'I am a friend of temperance and want it to succeed,' he said, 'but I don't think prohibition is practical. The Germans, you see, prevent it. Look at them. I am sorry to learn that they have just invented a method of making brandy out of sawdust. Now, what chance will prohibition have when a man can take a rip saw and go out and get drunk with a fence rail? What is the good of prohibition if a man is able to make brandy smashes out of the shingles on his roof, or if he can get delirium tremens by drinking the legs off the kitchen chairs?'"

Is After a Peerage

Through his open candidacy for a seat in the British House of Commons Waldorf Astor is recognized by London and New York society as being well along the way to become a member of the House of Lords. His generation of the Astor family seemingly has planted its fortune in English soil to remain. His younger brother, John Jacob Astor, is a lieutenant of the First Life Guards, and as such is a member of the royal household, often commanding the cavalry escort of the monarch on state occasions. Waldorf Astor, himself, enjoys to a very marked degree, the favor of King Edward, as well as the warm friendship of the reigning family. There has scarcely been a week-end party during the past season when British royalty has not been included in the house parties of Waldorf Astor and his wife at their place on the Thames, at Cliveden, where a few Sundays ago they received a long visit from King Edward. With all this prestige and royal backing the former American's progress towards the House of Lords will be comparatively rapid. While Waldorf Astor was still a youngster his father unconsciously helped him towards this goal of his ambition, for although born in New York he needs no naturalization papers to take his seat in either of the two houses of Great Britain's Parliament. For the fact that his father, at one time United States Envoy to Rome, secured English letters of naturalization while his two boys were under age converted them, ipso facto, into Britons. Of course from an American point of view, on attaining their majority they could have recovered their United States citizenship by electing to belong to the land of their birth, rather than to the land of their adoption. Neither of them, however, saw fit to take this step, as both have always inclined to British life and citizenship.

Title Suggested

New York society is just now speculating on what title Waldorf Astor will assume when elevated to the peerage. As he lives at the historic seat of Cliveden many incline to think he may assume that title. There is already a Viscount Clifden and a Lord Clifton and such a choice on his part might lead to confusion. London society thinks he will do well to follow the example set by Lord Curzon, Lord Sanderson, Lord Bellew and Lord Welseley and merely prefix the title to his own patronimic and thus become "Lord Astor." Albert Kirby Fairfax, born in Virginia as an American citizen of American parents, and raised in Wall street business life is another American who is also making an effort to enter the House of Lords. Albert Fairfax, however, inherits his title to the Scotch baronet of Fairfax. His title is beyond dispute so he is certain to secure the enjoyment of his titular rights and privileges in the near future. Several generations of Virginia Fairfaxes declined the title, prefering to be known as plain American citizens. Albert Kirby, through his Wall street experiences, evidently realized the "Lordship" possessed some commercial value so he has gone after it. It was one of these Virginia Fairfaxes, by the way, who came to California years ago in quest of a fortune and located near San Rafael on the spot now named after his home Fairfax.

Canned Goods for Our Cousins

Californians have an idea, sort of general, and rarely specific that this is a great fruit State, but it sometimes takes concrete figures to open our eyes to what this really means. Such figures are often found in reports of ships' cargoes, as was the case last week when the Celtic Monarch sailed out of San Francisco for Liverpool with two thousand five hundred tons of California canned fruit as cargo. This of itself is rather startling, but it is but a part of the shipment that is being made to England by one firm alone. Following the Celtic Monarch will be four other large sailing vessels, each bound for England with the same amount of canned California fruit, making a total of twelve thousand five hundred tons or some twenty-five million pounds, all going to feed the people of England.

Orchards Where Once Was Trackless Wastes

There is no longer any such thing as a California desert. What reecntly formed a part of what was supposed to be unreclaimable land is now furnishing the finest agricultural products raised anywhere. The California Promotion Committee has been waging a strong fight for new settlers and one of its strongest arguments has been the great fertility of all California soil. In the desert land as it was formerly called, what looked like sand has been developed into a fine white ash, carrying all the life giving properties essential to plant growth. It is on what was once supposed to be desert that now great quantities of fruit is grown, and the new land under irrigation is proving a boon to the thousands of home seekers who are desirous of getting quick returns when they settle.

Encouraging to Automobilists

From its Eastern Bureau in New York The California Promotion Committee receives word that automobilists are taking much interest in California roads, and map companies are now securing data to be incorporated in their forthcoming road maps, showing California routes. The interest aroused by the Committee among Eastern automobilists is bearing good fruit. F. H. Elliott secretary of the Automobile Club of America, intends coming to California at an early date to talk up an organization of all the automobilists in the State. He is now referring all inquiries regarding California tours to the Committee, which has offered to supply maps and general information to all who desire to make a trip to California.

New Home of the Union League Club

The new building now being completed by Mrs. Annie M. Regan at Powell and O'Farrel streets for the new home of the Union League Club is very distinctive in character. Architect L. B. Dutton has spared no pains to make the fine brick and terra cotta structure one of the handsomest in the city. It is in a class by itself for the large building will not be a bee hive of miscellaneous business and professional life but will contain only the Union League Club on the three upper floors and fourteen of the finest stores of their kind in the city on the ground floor. Their location is unsurpassed as the building is located in the very heart of the new theater, hotel and shopping district. This new building serves to emphasize the epoch making change that O'Farrel and lower Powell streets are to be in the new center of the smart shops. The upper three floors were designed expressly for the home quarters of the Union League Club. The first floor is devoted to the private offices of the club managers and to a spacious grill and billiard room, Dutch cafe, handsome library, card rooms, service and other rooms. On the second floor are a superb dining room, the breakfast room, three private dining rooms, kitchens, refrigerators, etc., besides a number of very choice bed rooms facing O'Farrell street. The upper floor is given over entirely to sleeping apartments, each with its private bath. No pains and expense have been spared to make the quarters the most convenient and the handsomest for club purposes on the coast.

THE FINANCIAL OUTLOOK

By R. E. Mulcahy

The past week has shown no marked changes in Wall Street share values, the exception being Southern Pacific common, which sold at 100-⅝, the highest price ever attained. There has been good and constant buying of this stock ever since the price passed 75. It has become one of the favorite trading stocks; eastern investors and speculators are giving the merits of Southern Pacific more than passing consideration. The continuance of a six per cent dividend through the past depression has gained many friends for it. Stock Exchange operators are showing more and more confidence in the Harriman securities. Harriman is the opposite of Jay Gould. Harriman builds up instead of tearing down. Every property which has come under his control has advanced in efficiency, as well as having been given the best of management. The advance in Southern Pacific common stock has caused many rumors to be set afloat, among them the possibility of an increased dividend, which at this time does not seem reasonable. It is more reasonable to think that investors are learning more of the possibilities of the future of this property and that the six per cent dividend is rather attractive in these days of cheap money. If Southern Pacific can pay such a handsome dividend under present conditions, what will it be able to do in five or ten years, when the Coast receives its due proportion of population? Every day its local field is growing and at no distant date the Southern Pacific will be the "Penna" of the Pacific Coast. Its earning capacity will never grow less, but greater, and this is why Easterners are investing in Southern Pacific securities, and putting them in their strong boxes. Union Pacific and Atchison were rather active during the week, but fluctuated within a narrow range—around 158 there seemed to be plenty of stock for sale while at 156 there were resting orders to buy. On Saturday an element of uncertainty made its appearance in the Market, the cause of which has not been revealed as yet. The trading during the two hours on that day has seldom been equaled, blocks of stock from 5,000 to 10,000 shares were common transactions, small lots of 100 and 500 shares were frowned upon. American Smelters was the pivot upon which the market swung, for this reason many thought Lawson was working overtime. Another rumor was to the effect that the Rock Island crowd were attempting to carry out a new campaign of their own liking. Many other causes were assigned for the peculiar action of values, but nothing definite has as yet been forthcoming as the true cause. The action of New York Central also contributed largely to the unsettling of price conditions—the price declined quickly to par when buyers appeared causing a rally to 105, declining gradually to 103. Sharp declines as well as shap rallies will be characteristic of the Market for the coming month or six weeks, due to the political outlook. These conditions should cease early in October, when the assurance of one or the other presidential candidates of election will be pretty well foreseen. If Taft, it will mean a continuance of the upward trend of values, which will no doubt give us the highest prices ever seen, for many of the leading stocks. Prospective earnings will receive proper attention, based upon crop conditions, and prices for all food products—a brighter prospect has never before been known.

The local stock and bond market is again assuming a broader and more active condition. The lowering of money rates recently caused more attention to be directed toward stock and bond securities. The Pacific Gas & Electric 5 per cent bonds are gaining much favor of late as well as the preferred stock of the company. Something favorable to holders of the preferred stock is looked for in the very near future; the present price around 50@55 appeals to investors, as the good demand for the stock shows recently. The bonds are considered very cheap at present prices 77@80. United Railways common and preferred stock and bonds are in good demand both in the eastern and local markets.

For a month past, much eastern money has been seeking Power Investments on the Coast. It is quite likely a large amount of eastern money will find employment in this way on the Pacific Coast in the near future. It is believed many eastern mortgage companies will seek loans in the downtown district as soon as the buildings are occupied and can show their earning power, this will release many bank loans and allow other unbuilt districts a chance. Conditions are growing better every day.

PÈRES CHARTREUX

—GREEN AND YELLOW—

This famous cordial, now made at Tarragona, Spain, was for centuries distilled by the Carthusian Monks (Pères Chartreux) at the Monastery of La Grande Chartreuse, France, and known throughout the world as Chartreuse. The above cut represents the bottle and label employed in the putting up of the article since the Monks' expulsion from France, and it is now known as Liqueur Pères Chartreux (the Monks, however, still retain the right to use the old bottle and label as well) distilled by the same order of Monks, who have securely guarded the secret of its manufacture for hundreds of years, taking it with them at the time they left the Monastery of La Grande Chartreuse, and who, therefore, alone possess a knowledge of the elements of this delicious nectar. No Liqueur associated with the name of the Carthusian Monks (Pères Chartreux) and made since their expulsion from France is genuine except that made by them at Tarragona, Spain.

Romance in Her Marriage After All

Everyone had always expected that when Grace Llewellan Jones and her temperament ran into a romance it would not be spelled just like the rest of the world's So there was a tinge of disappointment when she became Mrs. Gibson at a big church wedding with all the details cut off the same bolt of white satin that other brides use. But whist! while I tell you something. There was a flavor of romance about it, after all, which the general public did not detect. In fact when all the details are known it is just possible that Cupid may be arrested for scorching. Miss Jones and Mr. Gibson were acquainted just two weeks, when their engagement was made known to a few intimate friends in New York and the young lady and her mother hurried out here to make arrangements for the wedding in their old home. They did not meet in Europe as has been generally believed but at a studio tea in New York. Gelett Burgess, who was supposed to be madly searching for the prototype of Lady Fessenden, the heroine of one of his best stories, in order that he might burn incense at her altar, had landed plump at the feet of Miss Jones instead. So when Mr. Gibson appeared at the studio he had to ask Burgess to move along. Of course Gelett does not take up much room, but still he looked like a crowd to the New York lawyer. The author sulked some about it and for two weeks showed up at teas in a lugubrious mood and absolutely refused to make conversation. As Miss Jones and Mr. Gibson went around with the same set it was a delicious performance for the onlookers. Miss Jones had come home from Germany with letters to the Frohmans and Daniel Frohman had applauded her work—dramatic recitations set to music, so that Mr. Gibson not only had to discourage other admirers but had to delicately amputate the appealing idea of recitals under Frohman's directions. A lawyer who could win a case like that in two weeks must know a thing or two not down in Blackstone. At last report Gelett Burgess had bobbed up cheerfully, and is once more trying to put salt on the tail of an ideal.

Fritzi Scheff Still Laughs

Apropos of the modern interpretation of the social status of artists, who have bent, if not broken, some of the pet conventions and commandments, it is interesting to learn that Fritzi Scheff, the fascinating, plans to marry again. Her choice, John Fox, Jr., is a man of some literary achievement, and altogether out of joint with the husband Mrs. Grundy would have selected for the irristible. Fritzi. The knowing ones have played the combination Scheff-Von Bardelben-Gould but "nothing like that on my calling cards," says Fritzi now. However even Mr. Fox may find that there are as many slips in life as in La Fontaine's fables, for up at the Bohemian club is a telegram sent in response to a congratulatory message wired by one of the members. It reads, "A thousand thanks but I am still Fritzi Scheff."

Campaigning in Lovely Gowns

The California suffragists are not taking their cue from the London suffragettes. Instead of throwing brickbats and stones at the Republican convention in Oakland on Thursday the local Susan B. Anthonys threw smiling glances and flaunted the freshest frocks. In fact the word was quietly passed round before hand by Mrs. Horace Coffin that every woman Jill present must look her prettiest so as to convince the convention that all women desiring suffrage are not frumps and dowds. Dozens of women bought new gowns and worked out exquisite color schemes so as to convince those men that lovely woman is not a rarity in the suffrage ranks. The women were determined to go their smiling way, no matter how disagreeable the chairman might be, and though they are all very much in earnest as far as suffrage is concerned, they behaved as though they had put on their best bib and tucker and were attending a reception. Mrs. Coffin, whose idea it was to rebuke old fashioned notions of suffragists by a sartorial fitness that would impress even a color-blind politician, looked especially charming.

Her Latest Bon Mot

Mrs. Stuyvesant Fish is in Paris just now trying to amuse herself. At a garden party there last week she became responsible for the following bon mot which was thought good enough to be mailed to intimate members of her set in New York. In referring to one of her friends she said: "She reminds me of the leaning tower of Pisa, because she's always leaning but never falls."

The Page-Nightingale Engagement

Mr. and Mrs. John Nightingale announce the engagement of their grand daughter Ellen Burwell Page to Dr. James Fowler Pressley. This engagement is the outcome of a long and devoted friendship of the Doctor for the pretty brunette. Miss Page is the daughter of the late Mr. and Mrs. Hamilton Page. Mrs. Page was Florence Nightingale. Many Californians will remember the hospitable old home of the Nightingales at Turk and Taylor streets. Later a beautiful home was built by Mr. John Nightingale at Haight and Buchanan where several of his children and grand children live to-day. Hamilton Page, the father of the prospective bride, belonged to the well known Page family of Virginia. Miss Page is a very lovable and attractive young girl with a genial and sunny disposition. She possesses a rich soprano voice and sings beautifully. Her mother died when she was about fifteen years of age; her father passed away after the fire. Miss Page has always made her home with her grandparents. Dr. Pressley is the son of Mrs. James Pressley and brother of Mrs. Thomas Duncan, whose home is in Santa Rosa. He is a rising young physician and has a host of friends. The wedding will take place in the near future. The engagement ring is designed with three large pearls encircled by diamonds.

Ringing the Wedding Bells

The wedding of Miss Betty Angus and St. George Holden will take place on Wednesday evening, September 2nd, at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. J. S. Angus. A reception to intimate friends will follow the ceremony. The bride will be attended by her sister Miss Mary Angus, as maid of honor, and by the Misses Marian Wright and Lillian Holden as bridesmaids. Hillyer Deuprey will be the best man. After a wedding tour, Mr. and Mrs. Holden will reside with the parents of the bride until their home in Filbert street is completed. Mr. Angus' gift to his daughter was the lot upon which the groom is building a pretty home. Mr. Holden is a member of the firm of Deuprey & Holden.

Engagement Announced

At a small tea last Wednesday at her Sausalito residence, Mrs. John E. Shoobert announced the betrothal of her daughter Miss Lilian Shoobert to Thomas Van Ness, Jr. Sausalito society had been expecting this bit of news for some time and consequently was more delighted than surprised. Once before Young Van Ness was an official suitor but Cupid tripped up before the altar was reached and the engagement was never consummated. Both families are prominent in society. Miss Shoobert's father, the late John E. Shoobert, was a partner of Truxtun Beale. There are four Shoobert sisters, Mrs. Robert Dunsmuir of Victoria, B. C., Mrs. Frederick Bancroft of Baltimore, Miss Frances Shoobert and Miss Lilian Shoobert. The Van Ness family is one of the most prominent in the early history of the state. The city's leading avenue was named after the pioneer member. Mr. Van Ness is a brother of Mrs. William Denman and Mrs. John Taylor. The wedding will probably take place during the winter.

Related to the Kirkhams

An engagement that will be of much interest to Californians on account of the prominence of the bride's family is that of Miss Lelia Safford, daughter of Mrs. May Kirkham Safford, of Springfield, Mass., to John Stevens, also of Springfield. The father of the prospective bride, the late J. D. Safford, was a banker of Springfield. Mrs. Safford will be remembered as the interesting and attractive May Kirkham, daughter of the late General R. W. Kirkham, one time quartermaster here, whose beautiful home in Oakland was the center of gaiety and exclusiveness in early days. Kirkham street, Oakland, was named after him. Other relatives of prominence here are Mrs. P. L. Wheeler, who was Mrs. Kirkham Wright of this city. The groom is very wealthy and is head of the largest twine manufacturing establishment in the world situated at Ludlow, Mass.

The Theobald-Otis Wedding

The wedding of Miss Evaline Theobald, eldest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. George Theobald, to Edwin Mastie Otis, eldest son of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Otis of Alameda, will take place on Wednesday evening, September 2nd at the residence of the bride's parents in Sacramento street. Only relatives and intimate friends will witness the ceremony, after which a reception will follow. Mr.

MRS. G. R. HANFORD

Mrs. Hanford is a member of the San Francisco Golf and Country Club, and a leading competitor for the Del Monte Golf Cup this season.

George Theobald, father of the prospective bride, is a native of London. He belongs to an old and aristocratic family. His father the late George I. Theobald was head of the well known shipping firm of G. I. Theobald & Co. During his life time he was a prominent member of the Union Club. The Theobald home was in California, where much entertaining took place, especially to visiting Englishmen of note. Many will remember the large and brilliant wedding of Miss Lizzie Theobald when she became the bride of Henry Harris Carlton, whose father was of the firm of Carlton & Coleman. All prominent early day people. Mr. George Theobald has been associated with the Liverpool, London & Globe Insurance Co. many years. A brother Mr. John Theobald is the manager of the Canton Insurance Co. He married the youngest daughter of the late Judge Rising. Mrs. George Theobald was Miss Hattie Yoell, daughter of the late J. A. Yoell, the well known lawyer, by his first wife, who was Miss Evaline Prothero, daughter of the late Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Welch Prothero, an aristocratic old Southern family. They came to California with one of the first ox-teams and settled in San Jose. Robert A. Theobald, U. S. N., Midshipman on the Wisconsin, is the only son of Mr. and Mrs. Theobald. A younger daughter noted for her beauty completes this interesting family. Equally prominent is the groom's family. Mr. Otis, Sr., is the well known lawyer. Mrs. Otis was Miss Mastic, after whose father Mastic street, Alameda, was named. After the wedding tour Mr. and Mrs. Edwin Mastic Otis will live in Alameda, where the groom has built and furnished a handsome home for his bride.

A Joke on American Heiresses

The particular joke in New York society, this week, is a story from Vienna setting forth in solemn detail the plans of King Peter of Servia to replenish his royal exchequer from the purses of a couple of American millionaires by marrying his sons to their daughters. It is assumed quite as a matter of course that any American millionaire with a marriageable daughter will jump at the chance to bestow a princely dowry in exchange for a princely coronet in the family, and there remains the chance— in this case remote—that the coronet may be exchanged for a crown. The Vienna joker soberly sets forth that the Czar is taking a keen interest in the plan and has provided King Peter with a high Russian officer who will go to America and search out likely heiresses. This officer, Tschere Spiridonovic, has just been especially promoted and decorated to make a greater impression on American society. It is further stated that Mr. Knowles, the American Minister at the Servian court, has been instructed to make a report upon the character of the young princesses.

Showered With Gifts

It is well that Mrs. Linda Bryan has a spacious home otherwise it would be impossible to store the numerous engagement presents pouring in upon her. Cut flowers arrive daily in profusion: each and every friend seems to have remembered this interesting matron. As the time is very short between now and the wedding it will be impossible for Mrs. Bryan to accept all the entertainments her various friends are planning for her. Tuesday Miss Georgia Hammon gave a luncheon and on Wednesday Mrs. Charles Fee entertained in her honor. Many more entertainments are cheduled.

Summer Visitors at Del Monte

My Monterey correspondent writes that by the register at Del Monte this week are names of some of the oldest families in California. There are Mr. and Mrs. William C. Ralston for instance. Mr. Ralston's father having been one of the first to make a fortune in the mines that brought thousands of pioneers to California. Early residents remember the lavish entertainments that banker

Ralston gave at his country home at Belmont. Then there is Mrs. Alexander, whose father, Colonel Charles Crocker was a well-known figure in San Francisco in early days and was one of the most frequent visitors to Del Monte when the hotel first opened a couple of decades or more ago. Mrs. Alexander is here with Mr. Alexander and their three daughters. Miss Jennie Crocker and her brother, Charles Templeton Crocker, grandchildren of Colonel Crocker are here. They have with them as their guest, Miss Gertrude Jolliffe. Miss Crocker has her riding horse here which she rides in white linen knickerbockers and high boots, over which, of course she wears a long coat. She has also a beautiful span of horses with a tiny tiger—he really is no bigger than a minute—on the back seat and a run-about which she drives herself. Other old Californians are Mrs. M. C. Low, whose husband was one of the early Governors. With Mrs. Low is her daughter, Miss Flora Low; both make their permanent home at Del Monte. Miss Jennie Flood, whose father, James C. Flood, was associated with O'Brien, William Sharon and others in the early Comstock mining, is also here. Among Oakland society people who will attend the tournaments here are Mr. and Mrs. Charles Wingate, accompanied by Mrs. Orestes Pierce; Mr. and Mrs. Eugene B. Braden and Mr. and Mrs. Wickham Havens, who motored down for a few days last week. Judge and Mrs. Carroll Cook and Mr. and Mrs. Timothy Hopkins are among those who are spending a fortnight at Del Monte.

To Inaugurate New Social Club

The house warming of the New Club House of the Marin County Club will probably be the social event of the season on the north side of the bay. On Saturday, September 12th, the new Club House will be inaugurated with a large dance. The members from San Rafael and Ross Valley are making preparations to entertain the far away guests at week end house parties, that they may avail of their invitations. The membership of the Club is principally made up of families of San Rafael and Ross Valley. Geo. M. Pinckard, of San Rafael, is president; Al Lilly is vice president, and R. J. Davis, secretary.

Many Guests at Pacific Grove

From Pacific Grove I hear that August has proven a record breaker for summer visitors. With the Red Men's convention last week, and the State Prohibition convention this week, the capacity of the pretty little seaside resort has been taxed to the limit. A number of pleasant little affairs have taken place during the week, none of which was more enjoyable than the thimble bee, given by Mrs. Josephine Hearst, in honor of Mrs. W. W. Stewart, the retiring president of the Mayflower society, who is soon to make her home in Sunnyvale. Mrs. Trask and her daughters, Miss Alice and Miss Stella Trask were recent visitors in the Grove. Miss Stella is an artist of considerable talent. Mr. and Mrs. J. C. Gerrick are occupying their cottage in the Grove where they will remain for a month. F. O. Paulin and family, of Los Angeles, were among the arrivals at the hotel last week, as were E. L. Sisson and family, of Red Bluff, and Colonel Preble, of Governor Gillett's staff, who spends a great deal of his time there. Other guests at the hotel are Miss Kate Duggan, who with her niece, Miss Stephens, of Sacramento, returned to the hotel after a brief absence in Mendocino county; Dr. L. M. Leiserving of Placerville, Mrs. W. L. McLean, Mrs. W. A. Curtis and F. W. Whitmore of Sacramento, Matthew S. Platz, of Bakersfield and J. Rupert Foster of Marysville.

Social Lines on the Del Monte Links

The next stunt on the social calendar is the athletic meet at Del Monte, and society is discussing some way of arranging the golf games without stepping on any one's foot. Last year the players drew for their partners, and the snob withdrew from the mob and refused to play. There are a number of good golf players not received in Burlingame, and when a young Blingum matron found that she was to play with a stunning young woman, who had recently acquired a very wealthy husband, via the divorce court, she laid down her golf stick and retired from the green. Fortunately Miss Florence Ives, whose kindness of heart measures larger than the cardiac enlargement of most society women, happened to be next on the list and she stepped into the breach.

Women whose scutcheons had never been scratched on the court calendar, but who just did not happen to belong to the right little, tight little confines of the smartest set, were snubbed by their partners who happened to wear the Blingum label. The petticoat golfers are apt to get a pain in their dispositions anyway, and when given a chance to relieve the smart by taking it out on lesser social lights the air is apt to bring with regrets and recriminations. So it is to be hoped that the women golfists will settle upon some way of moving the white dove of peace to the Del Monte links next week.

Has the Secret of Youth

The most amazing part of Maud Allen's career, to those who knew her out here as Maud Durrant, is the extreme youthfulness credited to her by the press and the people who crowd nightly to see her gyrate in her gauzy and jeweled state of undress. She is written down in the birthday book of artists as a girl still in her teens. Critics are unanimous in their statements that her extreme youth gives her an advantage over Isadora Duncan and other dancers of the "classic" school. As a matter of comparison with dozens of schoolmates, who went from their a' b' c's through compound fractions with Maud Durrant, the hands of the clock are approaching near half past thirty. A young matron, who confesses to thirty-five, told me the other day that giving the dancer generous benefit of the doubt that she was younger than most of the girls in her class, she would yet be thirty and then some. She saw her in London and does not wonder at the general mistake, for Maud is little and slim with the tender adolescent curves of a girl not yet entered upon womanhood. Even her face has the soft curves that life and experience usually dent and mar with telltale little lines. Twice she saw her driving with Mrs. Asquith, the wife of the Prime Minister, which goes to prove that the English aristocracy has not inherited the kid gloves with which the late Queen Victoria handled guest lists.

Mrs. M. A. Hirschman and maid have returned to the Peninsula after a two weeks' trip in the South.

Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Watkins are at the Peninsula.

Mr. and Mrs. Jules Brett have taken the Casey house in San Rafael for the winter. They were hosts at a dinner party during the week.

Mrs. W. P. Morgan has returned to her home in this city. Miss Ella Morgan spent the week end at the Hotel Rafael returning to Del Monte last Monday, where she will spend several weeks.

Mr. nnd Mrs. Walter Remington Quick left on Monday, Aug. 30th, for the East. They will be gone about a month. Mrs. Quick is the interesting niece of Mrs. Henry L. Dodge.

Mrs. J. Maxwell Reilley, wife of the Pastor of St. Paul's church, is lying very ill in the hospital. At last accounts she was improving.

Mr. F. W. Lefavor, U. S. N., and Mrs. Lefavor are at Aetna Springs.

Miss Maud O'Connor is the guest of Mrs. Isaac Requa at Aetna Springs.

Mrs. Charles McKinstry, who has been spending several months with her father at his home on Long Island, has returned with Major McKinstry from Del Monte and will spend the winter at the St. Francis.

Arthur F. Francis, Secretary of the Trans-Mississippi Commercial Congress, which meets in this city, October 6th to 10th, is a guest at the St. Francis.

Mrs. W. T. Swinburne, who has been at the St. Francis for the past week, left Monday on the Manchuria for Honolulu, where she will rejoin the Admiral, who sailed with the fleet. Mrs. Emil Bruguiere, who was to have sailed with her, changed her mind at the last minute and will remain at Del Monte with her mother, Mrs. A. M. Shortridge.

Francis B. Loomis, who was Assistant Secretary of State during Hayes administration, is at the Hotel St. Francis on his way to Tokio as a United States Commissioner to the Japanese World's Fair.

Among the San Franciscans registered at Aetna Springs this week are: Wm. H. Hill, Carmen C. Hanna, Richard Bradley, H. Witzemann, Miss Witzemann, Willis W. Brown, F. T. Martens, Miss Maud O'Connor. From Oakland: Frank Loughrey and Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Gassaway.

Joseph D. Redding has left for New York where he will spend several weeks.

The C. O. G. Millers will remain in Ross till October. Mrs. Miller, Sr., will take the Bandmann house there for the next two months.

Mrs. Jennie Whittier Bothin has taken apartments at the St. Xavier for the winter.

Mrs. William Mayo Newhall will leave for the East in a fortnight to place her son Mayo, Jr., in college, near Philadelphia.

The Edward Schmiedells, who have been passing the summer at Tahoe, will return about September 1st to their home in Ross. The Selfridges' who have been occupying the Schmiedell home will return to the city about that time.

Miss Natalie Hunt will leave for the East, September 1st on a visit lasting several months.

Mr. and Mrs. Orville Pratt are still touring the continent. Mrs. Miller and her daughter, who accompanied Mrs. Russell Wilson and Mrs. Pratt abroad, are in London where Miss Miller was taken dangerously ill requiring the services of a trained nurse.

Mrs. Robert Foute has been lying seriously ill at her apartments in the St. Xavier and it will be some time before she is able to leave her rooms. Miss Gussie has had to forego her visit to the different week end parties and has proved a devoted nurse.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry J. Crocker will remain some time in New York before returning home, after their trip abroad.

Mrs. William H. Beatty will leave next week on a several months trip to her old home in South Carolina.

Mr. and Mrs. Sherwood Hopkins have returned to town from their summer outing at Boca.

Mr. and Mrs. Emery Winship and Miss Patricia Cosgrave will leave in a fortnight for Macon, Ga., where they will spend the winter.

Dr. McEnery, Miss McEnery and Miss Isabel McLaughlin are now in England where they will spend the remainder of the summer.

Mrs. Mildred D. Gear and George S. McKenzie were married this week in Napa. The bride is a daughter of B. F. Durfree, the lumber merchant of this city, and the widow of Judge George Gear of Honolulu. Mr. McKenzie has large business interests in Oakland and their home will be made there.

The regular financial letter issued by the American National Bnk under the date of August 25th is packed with timely and comprehensive information on the local, national and world's financial condition. Nothing better of its kind is issued on the Coast.

Miss Dolly McGavin is visiting friends in Napa County.

Miss Camillo Martin and her sister, Miss Mary Hyde, will leave for Europe some time in September. They will spend several months in sight seeing on the continent.

Eastern Tennis Champions Coming

Word has just been received that there will be a strong contingent from the East to play in the Pacific Coast Championship Tennis Tournament which is to be held at Del Monte September 7th to September 19th. Among those who have already made entry are Nathan W. Niles, champion tennis player of Harvard; Wallace F. Johnson, Interscholastic Tennis Champion of the Eastern States; Irving C. Wright, brother and strong opponent of Beals Wright, the champion. These men will match their skill for the first time on the Pacific Coast against such men as Maurice McLaughlin, Melvin Long, George Jones, Carl Gardner and Simpson Sinsabaugh. May Sutton, the California tennis wonder, with her sisters Miss Florence Sutton and Mrs. B. O. Bruce, will also be on the courts. From the present indications the coming tournament will bring out a strong array of tennis experts.

Golf Tournament Now the Theme

Local players are much interested in the tournament which begins on Monday, August 31, on the Del Monte grounds. The cups and trophies are presented by the Hotel Del Monte. A committee chosen from the players will assign the handicaps and decide any points which may arise. Five of the leading golf and country clubs of the Pacific Coast will be represented by gentlemen who have kindly consented to act. These men are all familiar with the form of the players and their decision will be final. Entires for any of the events may be made up to six o'clock of the day preceding the play.

Good Opera at the American

A number of old time Tivoli favorites headed by Edith Mason and Tom Perrse are back in San Francisco, at the American theater, singing the "Love Tales of Hoffman," this week, and they are furnishing a class of opera that smacks of the rare good music we enjoyed before the fire. The Idora Park Company could hardly have made a better selection than this melodious piece to re-introduce themselves to the favor of the public. The principals have thoroughly familiarized themselves with the several roles and exercise fine judgment in keeping their vocal flights well within the scope of their own powers; the excellent chorus is splendidly drilled and handled, and Paul Steindorf leads the well balanced orchestra in his old time masterful fashion, bringing out all the shading of the graceful music. Under his judicious leadership the action went with a delightful swing and rythm. His excellent work was fully appreciated as was testified by the generous applause that greeted him every time he climbed into the chair to wave his baton. In this charming opera Offenbach for the moment has laid aside his impish bacchic pipes and familiar ways and has written some of his most feeling and most pathetic scores. The contribution offers his admirers a new vision of the breadth, precision and gracefulness of this erratic genius. Despite the clever handling of the music, the well defined climaxes of the book at each curtain impresses the casual observer that he is viewing four one-act operettas. Each is a gem in its way and in each the composer has placed melodies that afford flights and sweep to rare voices. Several of these numbers rank among the best loved melodies of the composer. They are happily rendered by the present company. In some respects the cast is unusually flexible in voices and in acting and readily adapts itself to the many roles of the book and the ranges in music. Edith Mason in the parts of the trick doll, the Italian coquette and the dying consumptive singer surprised her friends by her clever impersonations and her improvement. Her rendering of the famous barcarole in the second act roused persistent encores and won her new admirers. Thomas Persse carried the somewhat trying vocal role of Hoffman, the poet, with his old time forceful spirit. The smooth contralto voice of Bernice Holmes was as admirable as ever and Charles Swickard and Joseph Fogarty acted and sang at their best and that best was rewarded with numerous warm recalls.

Of its musical kind the production is by far the best that has been heard in town in a long while.

Plots for New Plays

The new plays for the coming season are already being discussed along the New York rialto. Among them are two that will be prominently billed. Edmund Day's "The Widow's Mite" is a story of Wall street. The widow is the relict of one of four village boys who fare forth to make their fortunes in the metropolis. One marries the village belle and wins his fortune, plunges, is betrayed, and loses all. His failure costs him his life. The three survivors keep the fact of his lost fortune from the widow. They raise an allowance for her which they call "the widow's mite." She is the silent partner in all of their enterprises. Each is eager to marry her. They enter into a scheme to buy up a little jerk-water railroad which will give them a connection between two trunk lines and an outlet to the sea. The widow with her mite buys the line, and because of a fancied wrong almost breaks her friends by refusing to sell them the road. The atmosphere is cleared in a big scene in a Wall street office while a panic rages on the floor of the Stock Exchange.

Booth Tarkington's offering will be "The Man From Home." It has already scored a great success in Chicago. The plot deals with two wealthy young Hoosiers from Indiana, a brother and sister, who decide to live in Europe. In Italy they are taken up by members of the intriguing impecunious nobility. The girl by artful blandishments is inveigled into paying $750,000 for permission to marry into a "noble" family. Her guardian in Indiana, "The Man From Home," hears of the plot, hurries to Italy and in a clever way quickly unmasks the conspirators and marries the girl himself.

"The Man of the Hour" at the Van Ness

"The Man of the Hour" which is playing a return engagement at the Van Ness Theater to crowded houses is a lesson in practical politics. It visualizes conditions which have made the local governments of American cities a reproach to the nation and a laughing stock to foreign students of municipal affairs. It is, perhaps, overdrawn in detail, but the facts are there and the facts are ugly things. There is little theorizing in the play. It has to do with actual conditions, forcibly presented. It is a pitiful, a shameful story. If Mr. Broadhurst has exaggerated his characters—and Horrigan is exaggerated—he has done so to draw with surer lines the picture he would present. His is not a painting that requires careful hanging and special lighting for its appreciation. It stands out from the canvas boldly, frankly, obtrusively. There is no getting away from it. To make his play practical for stage use, Mr. Broadhurst has cleverly interwoven an interesting love story with the practical politics of his plot; and he has consequently exaggerated some one or two of his characters. Such a man as Horrigan never could have risen to be boss of a city. He might have dominated a slum ward, but beyond that he could not go. As he himself says, he knows nothing of diplomacy. He is a political bully, his one weapon the big stick. He is a boss without craft. Such men do not attain to the power he is depicted as swaying. More natural is Alderman Phelan, honest for the once, because anxious to pay off a grudge against the boss; an Irish politician, boasting that he knows the first name of every voter in his ward, including the "Dagoes and Polacks." The company presenting "The Man of the Hour" is a strong one and the several roles in the main are excellently handled. Louis Hendricks as the boss plays the part as the author designed it to be played. It is, in truth, a caricature rather than a character, but Hendricks is not responsible for that.

RUBY BRIDGES.

Now appearing in "The Man of the Hour" at the Van Ness Theater.

JOHN B. MAHER
at the Alcazar

Cyril Scott, as the Mayor, is convincing and he is not "stagy" for which we would forgive him much were he in need of such dispensation. Neil Moran, likewise gives a good portrait of the "man higher up," and Felix Haney is admirable as Alderman Phelan. Ruby Bridges plays the role of the young woman with whom the mayor is in love. The next Van Ness attraction will be the notable musical comedy hit, "The Girl Question."

Ready for the Warfield Engagement

It is the desire of both David Belasco and the Alcazar management to make David Warfield's coming season in his native town a memorable instance of absolutely fair treatment of all who are so eagerly waiting to see him in "The Music Master." In pursuance of that desire it has been decided to reserve no seats until the advance sale opens at the Alcazar box office at 9 o'clock, next Thursday morning. Those persons nearest the head of the line will be likely to go away best served. The engagement of Mr. Warfield commences on Monday evening, September 7th, and will continue five weeks, during which period he will be seen in his two greatest successes, "The Music Master" and "A Grand Army Man." The fame of this play has preceded it, of course, and all the theaters in San Francisco could not hold the people who have applied for seats at the opening performance at the Alcazar. Mr. Warfield will be supported by the players who last appeared with him in New York.

White Whittlesey to Close His Season

White Whittlesey's very successful season at the Alcazar closes with next week, and as on appropriate final offering he has chosen R. V. Esmond's idyllic comedy, "One Summer's Day," in which he scored one of the big successes of his last San Francisco engagement. It was originally produced in England with pronounced success, and the impression it made in this country when presented by John Drew was even more emphatic. A more perfect vehicle for exploiting Mr. Whittlesey's most engaging method could not have been selected. All the action of the piece takes place, as the title implies, on one summer's day in rural England. It begins with a picnic, evolves in its course a matrimonial engagement, its subsequent rupture, and closes with a second betrothal under the light of a glorious moon. The story shows how British gentliity is brought in contact with a band of gypsies through the marriage of one of the sons of a noble family to a beautiful Romany girl. He dies, and his brother takes upon himself the obligation of bringing up as his own son, the boy born of the mesalliance. By doing so he jeopardizes himself in the esteem of the girl he loves, and not until the child is accidentally killed and its parentage disclosed is the uncle relieved from the complications in which his good nature had involved him. As the uncle, Mr. Whittlesey is neither a swashbuckler nor a Romeo, but a philosophic quizzical old bachelor, with more heart and tenderness than he cares to show. The role calls for a great deal of fine, sympathetic delineation, and Mr. Whittlesey identifies himself exactly with it. Miss Barriscale will have a pleasing part as the heroine, and all the Alcazar favorites are cast to their own and the public's advantage. Opportunities for elaborate and artistic scenic embellishment are abundant, and the Alcazar's management can be depended upon to carry out the spirit of the author's inteniton to depict the lazy delight of a summer's day in an English coutryside.

Capital Vaudeville at the Orpheum

The Orpheum programme for the week beginning this Sunday matinee will be headed by Edna Phillips, an exceedingly attractive and gifted high commedienne, who has been identified successfully with several great New York successes. Miss Phillips will appear in an amusing little skit by Una Clayton, entitled "Lost-A Kiss in Central Park." It deals withe th complications arising from mistaken identity between a beautiful and cultured girls and her frivolous French maid in which a lost kiss and the loss of part of the maid's wearing apparel are confused. Miss Phillips will have the assistance of Katherine Kinsella, Hale Norcross, Fenton Ford and B. Giovanni Piazzo. The Three Grassys, fresh from European triumphs, will introduce what they term an illusionary musical novelty, a combination of mystery and melody, the latter being accomplished on three extraordinary instruments of their own contrivance. The Wilson Brothers, Frank and Joe, will submit their new German comedietta, "A Padded Cell," for the approval of the audience. In it they assassinate the English language and also introduce new parodies and warble coon songs and yodle. Carter and Bluford will contribute what they call "the act beautiful." It consists of character singing and dancing the effect of which is heightened by beautiful and appropriate scenery and costumes. Miss Bluford, who is nothing if not versatile, will appear as a Spanish Senorita, a Creole and an Indian Squaw, and Carter, who is a capital singing and dancing comedian, will impart a humorous touch to the sketch. Next week will be the last of the Four Baltus; Howard and Howard, Dolesch and Zillbauer and the De Haven Sextette, with Sydney C. Gibson. New Orpheum Motion Pictures will be an interesting finish to the performance.

Ferris Hartman continues to pack the Princess Theater at every performance. This week he is repeating one of his greatest triumphs, Johann Guggenheimer in "The Toy Maker," and in consequence of his great popularity in it the management has decided to continue this delightful musical play all next week. Zoe Barnett, Arthur Cunningham and Sarah Edwards particularly distinguish themselves. Monday evening, September 7th Mr. Hartman will appear in "The Wizard of the Nile," which will be given a superb production. The splendid cast will include Sybil Page, the favorite prima donna.

"Love Tales of Hoffman" a Success

The critics of New York made on mistake when they pronounced "The Love Tales of Hoffman" to be Offenbach's greatest effort and that it was the most melodious and sweetest light-opera that had been produced in many years. The opera, which was produced for the first time in this city at the American theater last Sunday night, has scored a distinct triumph and will undoubtedly play to crowded houses for several weeks. Many local favorites are in the cast and the old days at the Tivoli are recalled in listening to the captivating voices of Edith Mason, Bernice Holmes, Thomas H. Persse and the rest of the popular singers who compose the well-balanced company. Then there is sterling Paul Steindorff, the most popular wielder of the baton that ever lead an orchestra in this city. The two greatly talked of numbers—the barcarole and the intermezzo—have created a furore in musical circles. No fault whatever can be found with the production. It is sumptuously mounted while the costumes are fresh and Mr. Swickard deserves much credit for the able manner in which the production is staged. The Venetian scene in the second act is particularly noteworthy from a scenic standpoint; some of the most delightful music of the entire opera is crowded into this act.

There will be the usual Saturday and Sunday matinees during the engagement of "The Love Tales of Hoffman," at which special popular prices will be charged.

Odd Things in the World

Tribute Levied by the Black Hand

Alfred Henry Lewis, in an article on the Black Hand in the August issue of the Broadway Magazine, says there are 30,000 members of the Black Hand society in New York, in an Italian population of about 600,000. That means one blackmailer, kidnapper, bomb thrower and assassin in every twenty Italians. The amount of blackmail annually extorted by the Black Hand is estimated to be $6,000,000.

Parrots as Advertisers

A new advertising school has been started in the Grand Montrogue district of Paris, with the object of making parrots of commercial value. The manager of the school says that a clever parrot may be very useful as an advertiser and he is at present teaching a number of them to cry aloud the excellence of various products. These birds will later on be hung in cages in prominent position on the boulevards. The birds are being taught by a phonograph in dark rooms.

To Satisfy Communists

At a beautiful little village known as Crocknacrieve, in the County of Fermanagh, Ireland, a temporary colony of about 1,000 inhabitants has been established, and they are practicing a phase of socialism which is thorough enough in character to satisfy the most advanced communists. The colony is composed of men and women of various nationalities. The Irish predominate. There are representatives of France, Germany, Spain, the United States, New Zealand, Australia, South Africa and Canada. These men and women are identified with a religious movement started four or five years ago in Enniskillen and are known throughout the North of Irland as Cooneyites, this name having been fastened on them as a result of the association with the movement of Edward Cooney, a large farmer residing in County Fermanagh. The Cooneyites insist on a literal interpretation of the Scriptures in so far as they refer to the care of the poor and the virtue of poverty. They live in camps. Men do the cooking, while the women look after the other domestic duties. Immersion is a requirement for membership.

Antidote for Souvenir Hunters

The "souvenir hunting" season has begun in London and several hotel managers are trying a novel antidote. They are providing cheap souvenirs for their American visitors to carry away, in the hope that they will overlook such things as silver spoons and lace fringed napkins. At luncheon little silver ice spoons with "London" printed on them will be forthcoming for each woman visitor. At dinner paper fans and at tea paper napkins with views of London engraved on them will be supplied to guests. Men will have match cases with white leather also marked "London." At one hotel the manager intends to have booklets instead of the ordinary menu card, and after ordering the guest may keep the book, which will be provided with a pencil so that the members of a party may sign their names.

The Limit in Insurance

That you can insure against anything from the election of Bryan to the birth of twins is a commonplace, yet a traveler in Lausanne discovered something new in insurance the other day. He complained to the landlord of his hotel that he had been troubled by bugs in his bed. To which his host replied: "You astonish me greatly, sir, and yet I am insured."

"Insured against what?" asked the guest.

"Against bugs and insects." And the landlord explained that there is in Switzerland a company which insures against all risks and perils arising from these troublesome insects. It engages to free a house from them, and if it fails to keep it free it pays for each bed where they are found, just as a fire insurance company pays for a bed that has been burned.

The Latest Typewriter Girl

Some profane business men will be pleased to learn that, according to the New York Tribune, a typewriter girl "that runs by electricity instead of chewing gum" has been invented by a Cleveland man. The machine, it is explained, will operate an ordinary typewriter, just as swiftly and more accurately than a girl, by means of perforated slips, somewhat similar to the manner in which a mechanical piano player works. While it is not indicated how the slips are perforated the advent of the electric typewriter is certain to be hailed with joy by many people.

Auto Notes

H. C. Warwick, the well known contractor of this city, has just returned from a most unusual and interesting trip that covered some parts of California where an automobile had never been seen, and was therefore an object of great wonder to the inhabitants. Mr. and Mrs. Frank Davis and Walter Haas accompanied Mr. Warwick in his Thomas-Detroit and all have many interesting stories to tell of their tour. The party visited Georgetown, Two Channel Mine, Tiptop Hill Mine, Georgie Slide and Kentucky Flat in the Sierras.

In the recent Demountable Rim Contest, under the auspices of the Chicago Motor Club, the Diamond, Fisk, Continental and Nadall rims were entered. The test was very thorough, and under the direct supervision of the Technical Committee of the Chicago Club. The rims were tested for staying qualities on the road as well as for speed in climbing. The Diamond Demountable rim won on both points. Four tires were changed with the Diamond rim, the total time charged being five minutes, thirty-six and two-fifths seconds.

With a pair of antlers fastened on the automobile for lamp brackets and dusty after a long day's run Dr. McClenihan passed through San Francisco yesterday on his way home to Belmont. He has been on an extended hunting trip in his White steam car. The medico and party of huntsmen which include E. F. Schalbert of Los Angeles and E. Bergh of Belmont, left on the twentieth of July. They camped out during the journey of 900 miles. Most of the touring was done through Trinity County where automobiles are seldom seen. The White was driven over the Salt Creek grade, 18 miles long. Dr. McClenihan says that no motor car has ever before performed this feat. On one trip the motorist was obliged to ford a creek nineteen times, yet desipte all the hardships encountered the machine did not falter once. The doctor succeeded in shooting two deer and another member of the party got a third.

Word received yesterday by the Pioneer Automobile Company to the effect that the Thomas car, driven by George Salzman, the head of the Savannah race meet, captured the honors in the Perry Hill climb held under the auspices of the Chicago Motor Club at Algonquin, August 14th. The time for the quarter mile of eight per cent grade was 252-5 seconds. This performance was followed later in Class F, when the Thomas reached the Peak in 253-5 seconds, tieing the best time made on the climb. Good work was also done by the Chalmers-Detroit, making the fastest time for cars in its class. The speed with which the little Chalmers-Detroit took the grade was a surprise to the spectators.

The record of the White Steam car over the railroad ties of the Mt. Tamalpais Railway from West Point to the tavern at the summit is 8 minutes and 26 seconds. The time still stands, though a motorcycle record of 8 minutes and 34 seconds, established last week, is said to have been "faster time than made by any automobile previously."

On account of the general discussion and comment on the famous Chalmers-Detroit "30," which is on exhibition at the salesroom of the Pioneer Automobile Company, E. P. Hart, expert machinist of the company decided to put the car to a severe test and yesterday invited Andrews, Woodard and Keenan, three of the best known automobile experts in the city, to be present at the examination. The car was put through all kinds of work, both on the road and in hill climbing, and at the finish the bunch of flaw-pickers had nothing but praise to say for the little machine.

J. W. Drew and wife of Boston, who are touring on the Coast in a Thomas Flyer, have arrived at Bodie, Cal., after a strenuous trip from Thorne, Nevada. Drew says that there is not a car built that would have made the tour under the same conditions. Drew is a mining man and is combining business with pleasure on the tour.

H. V. Watt of Honolulu is visiting in San Francisco for a few days and has been "seeing the sights" from the tonneau of a big White Steamer. Mr. Watt is one of the ardent motorists of the islands. He owns a White and says that just before his departure the odometer showed a mileage of thirty thousand, five hundred. "And I have driven every bit of that distance myself," remarked the visitor.

the stock. Hamilton was sent back to Venezuela as the manager of the company. He spent his profits like water. They disappeared recklessly in yachts, splendid entertainments and in riotous living. Notwithstanding his great income in a short time he was in debt and his partners soon had him on the hip, out of a job, out of the trust, overboard. He wandered about South America for awhile trying to break into other good ventures and finally disappeared. His wife went to New York and kept a boarding house; then she too disappeared. An assassin's bomb missed its mark but frightened President Blanco out of Venezuela. Some $25,000,000 in gold had preceded him so he was prepared in a measure for the flight. With his daughter he went to New York. There they were met by the Duke de Morny and the arrangements for the wedding were completed. The Duke receiving $4,000,000 as a settlement and the sensational suicide of his mistress appeared in the morning papers alongside the details of his magnificent wedding. The $4,000,000 dowry lasted him just two years. He promptly demanded more but Blanco became alarmed at his extravagance and thereafter drew tight the purse strings. When he died, a little later, the de Mornys succeeded to the large portion of his vast fortune.

Meanwhile the General Asphalt Company was accumulating various vital troubles. The catastrophe culminated in the Matos rebellion. For a time it looked very much as though Matos would defeat his brother-in-law, Castro. The latter appeared to be driven into the last ditch, but Castro is a remarkable man to wriggle out of apparent defeat. At the time it was known that the Matos insurgents were receiving very substantial aid from some very rich and very powerful source. After Castro won the day he set about rooting out the sources that had contributed aid to his enemies and among others he came across the trail of the General Asphalt Company. At once he forfeited the concessions granted that corporation in Venezuela. A little later he preferred charges in Washington and asked that the case be heard before an American commission. During the hearing, General Green, president of the asphalt company, admitted on the witness stand that he had outfitted the steamer Ben Rye with a fighting crew and munitions of war for the benefit of Matos. The trust's explanation was that they were caught between two fires; that if they had not yielded to Matos' demands and put this armed vessel at his disposal he would have destroyed all their valuable property, worth many millions of dollars, which was at the district captured by him; Castro at the time being unable to afford them any protection.

It was upon information adduced before the commission in New York that Castro brought suit against the General Asphalt Company in the Venezuelan courts and obtained a judgment of $5,000,000 damages. In view of the lives that were lost and the property destroyed in the rebellion Castro insists that this fine is not excessive. On this same judgment Castro has seized the company's property and is working it himself. Under his management the price of asphalt has fallen one-half, as he does not have to pay the high interest charges on the company's stocks and bonds. He says the company can have its property back on the day it pays the fine.

Castro is forceful, aggressive, stubborn, quick to anger and of unquestioned courage. While serving as a member of the Venezuelan legislature, in 1897, he was of great assistance to Andrade in securing the presidency. Like the other leaders, who had worked for Andrade, he expected some reward of office for his services. He was ignored. Castro gave notice that he would return with an army and become the next president, and he did, in 1899. As president his rule is considered supreme, after the manner of all Venezuelan presidents. The Matos revolution was the last one he grappled with and he made such thorough work of the insurgents that there have been very little signs since of trouble in that direction.

President Diaz of Mexico is Castro's ideal. His slogan is South America for the South Americans. He ranks high with the people of the South American governments and his policies are followed with intense interest. Like the Sultan he is shifty, resourceful, determined and does not know what the word defeat means, for no matter how desperate his straits he fights till time, chance, or his own energies find him a way to escape. He was sick and supposed to be on his death bed when General Paredo landed with his revolutionists but Castro, between fever gasps, followed up his enemies persistently and crushed them even though some of his orders were "overlooked" by several of his time serving followers, who dreaded, lest his death might throw the government into the hands of Paredo. That he is a keen diplomat and well able to take care of himself with the world powers was evidenced by his move in the Bermudez Asphalt case when he cancelled the concessions of that company, and followed it up by the famous "revolutionary suit." This last move was an afterthought but an embarrassingly clever one as it made his position so strong on the records. Castro is ambitious to keep the development of the natural resources of the country in the hands of the natives. His method may suggest the ancient days of the Spanish Main but the land he rules and the people he dominates are in the melodramatic period. In justification of his course and in explanation of the opposition he is meeting in some lines, Castro points to the antagonism that Diaz had to face and overcome before he won his present position.

Man-to-Whom-One-Could-Not-Lie

"Yep, and do it quick, little boy."

"I assure you that it contains nothing but my sketches."

The official condescended to lean over toward the painter and murmur in his ear: "I believe you, and will not lie to you. I have the authority, however, and I propose to use it. When I give an order I don't want any back talk. That is one of the few consolations I have on this earth; that I am able to make it hot for the people who pass through. I get a certain amount of satisfaction, and I need it all the more whenever I have had a quarrel with my wife. People who have any education understand these things without being told. Come, open that box, Cully, get a move on."

Gregory opened his box, nailed it up again and then called a cab. The coachman said to him, smiling pleasantly: "You got it in the neck, didn't you? I'm glad of it."

Arrived at his studio, he took his sketches out and hung them on the wall. They looked very well to him and he wished others to admire them, so he called in his neighbor, who was a painter like himself, and moreover a good judge of art.

"Bravo! Good!" exclaimed his confrere. "That is just what I expected of you. Your work is simply vile. You haven't the slightest talent, you poor devil, and now you have proved it beyond the shadow of a doubt."

Gregory was deeply hurt, but his friend slapped him on the shoulder and said: "You understand, my dear fellow, I do not want to lie to you. You might be a success at making shoes, but never as a painter."

When he was alone Gregory thought: "Perhaps it is true. Great heaven! Am I really the man-to-whom-one-cannot-lie? Let me hope that at least this time he has lied."

As there seemed to be no pleasure left for him in life he determined to make himself useful, and went to call on the deputy from his province, who received during the morning, as usual, and who had always been very kind to him. The statesman received him with open arms.

"Sit down, my dear boy," he cried, "for I can't kick you out without having a quarrel with your father, who has some influence in our district. Take this chair, which, by the way, is all that you will get. What have you come to beg for now? Do you think that I am going to use my influence with the government, to get it to buy one of your pot-boilers? I'm going to promise you that I will do it and also promise myself that I will do nothing of the kind. All my constituents bother me to death, and you bore me more than anyone else. Now get out, and for heaven's sake, never come back!"

The deputy rose, shook him warmly by the hand, and pushed him gently toward the door.

Gregory, somewhat disconcerted, went to a restaurant, where he ordered a sumptuous lunch; but he had no appetite. While he was seated at table a rich banker at whose house he had often dined and where he had always thought himself welcome, came and sat down at the same table.

"How are you, my dear fellow? You are a good deal of an ass, but I am going to lunch with you simply because there doesn't happen to be anyone else here. I'm simply furious. I put up a job on a friend of mine by the name of Erman, by which I expected to make him lose a couple of millions; he would have been ruined and would have blown his brains out. But the old pirate smelled a rat and I slipped up."

"But are you not an honest man?"

"I would be more honest if I had more money. How the devil do you think I made my money?" He hesitated a moment and then continued: "By the way, I don't know why I am telling you all this."

"Because I am the man-to-whom-one-cannot-lie."

"I don't know anything about that, but I shall never forgive you for listening to what I have just told you. Never tell anyone a word I have said, and I beg of you—and what is more, I advise you—for your own sake, never put your feet in my house again."

Gregory went out, wondering if there was not someone he knew who still possessed a little purity and honesty. Suddenly he bethought himself of a cousin, some two years younger, a very modest, chaste and timid little girl, and also very pretty. He went to her house and found her in tears.

"What are you crying for, my dear cousin?"

"I am crying because vacation is at an end and I have to go back to school."

"The city will soon tire you."

"No, that is not it, but I have a beau here; we used to take walks in the park, at sunset, and even by moonlight. I thought he would have a little more courage and say something or do something, but just as he was coming to the point I have to go back to school. It seems to me that I am good looking enough to turn the heads of young men—don't you think so? Now I have to wait a whole year before getting another chance!"

"But what is this you are telling me, my quiet, modest little cousin?"

"The truth, and I don't know what makes me tell it, anyway."

"Because I am the man-to-whom-one-cannot-lie."

Gregory returned to his rooms. He avoided meeting the janitor, for he did not wish to be cursed, and went to bed without supper. The following day he was equally unfortunate, and the same things happened to him every day thereafter. Everybody confessed to him their vices or reproached him with his own. Now that he knew what other people really were, he found himself incapable of friendship or affection, of confidence or of pity; now that he knew himself he had neither courage nor hope. He had lost his youth, for after all real youth and the joys of youth are due to our ignorance of the world as it is. In three months he was an old man.

One day, filled with rage, he jumped on a train and returned to Brittany. The winter was there now and the wind blew through the bare branches with a chilling and desolate sound.

"Oh, fairy, bad fairy! I am old and I have never lived! I delivered you from the gnomes and you gave me back to them to be devoured. You have returned evil for good!"

"Good!" answered the echo.

For he was "the-man-to-whom-one-cannot-lie."

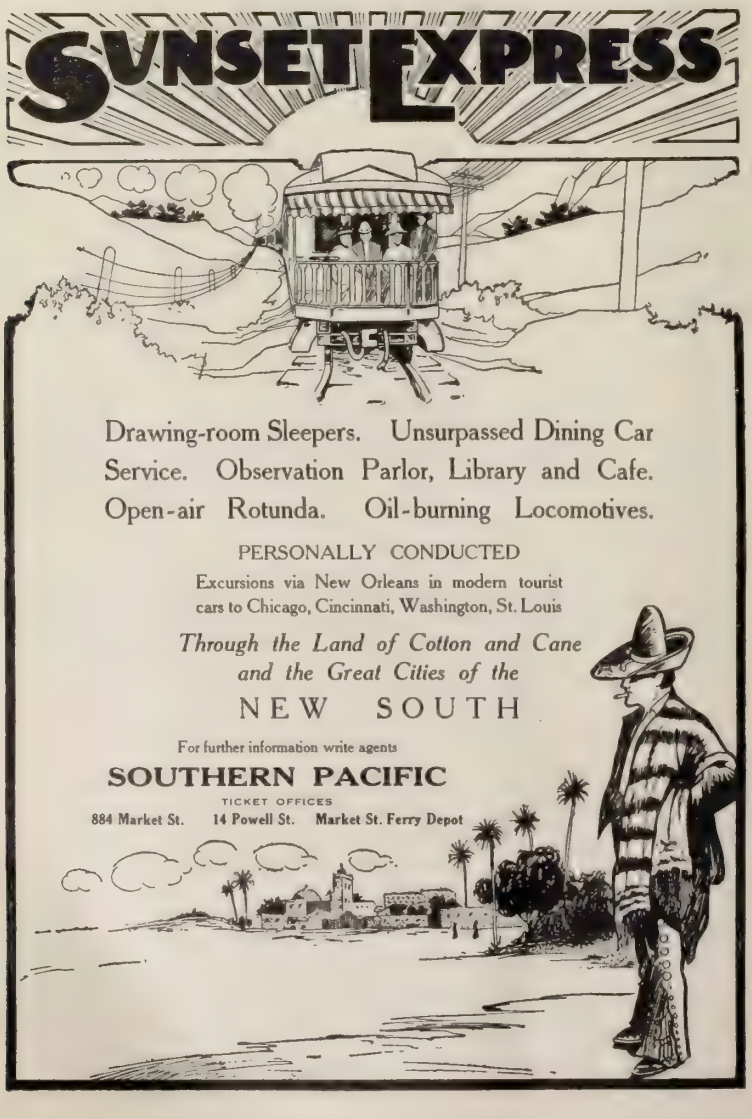
A Tale of Mystery



Harold Morton Kramer shows a decided advance in each successive romance which he puts forth. His third novel, "Castle of Dawn," has not only much more flesh and blood, but a good, bony skeleton on which to support them. A special writer for one of the Chicago newspapers was dispatched to Texas to gather inside information concerning some land frauds. On his way to the railroad station he stopped to say farewell to a lawyer friend who, unknown to him, was concerned in secret service investigations dealing with a Central American revolution which was planned and which, there was reason to believe, was incubating conveniently near some southern port of the United States. At the same time, the only daughter and heiress of a Chicago millionaire, who was setting out on a visit to friends, and who had never in her life traveled unattended by a retinue, determined for once, to prove that she could care for herself for a few brief miles. The newspaper man was followed from his friend's office by a spy of the conspirators who assumed that he was a detective on their trial. The girl, after the manner of inexperienced travelers, needed some slight assistance which the newspaper man rendered to her, and in consequence the spy assumed they were in collusion. A railroad accident which happened at a convenient point threw both into the arms of the conspirators and they were bundled off, willy-nilly, into the wilds of the Ozark mountains where they were made members of a mysterious household. While treated with paternal kindness and not forcibly restrained, it soon became evident that there was no possibility of escape for, should they stray from sight, a signal would be immediately sounded giving warning throughout the whole vicinity that the internal revenue officers were on a raiding expedition, and the local moonlighters would have made short work of their lives. The prisoners, unaware of the reason for their captivity, made the most of their situation. Meanwhile the Chicago journal is in search of its lost reporter and the millionaire parent is raising all but the dead in frantic efforts to recover his kidnapped heiress. Of course everything came out right in the end, even the chance to dig up the inside facts of the land frauds, and it goes without saying that the only nephew of a rich but eccentric uncle and the only spoiled daughter of a Chicago millionaire were not imprisoned together for weeks, under such thrilling conditions, without falling properly in love. The mystery is carefully concealed, so that the interest is retained to the end and there is enough in it to make a fairly good melodrama. Published by Lothrop, Lee and Shepard.

From "Together," by Robert Herrick

The fine arts are duly recognized in American cities; but the commercial class, as has always been its wont, places them in a category between millinery and theology.

A man who amounts to anything is always a specialist, and he doesn't care for feminine amateurishness. An acquaintance with Dante and the housing of the poor doesn't broaden the breakfast table, not a little bit.

In some ways men read men more rapidly than women can. They look for fewer details, with an eye to the essential stuff of character.

Perkins' Latest Triumph

To no man, perhaps, was the recent primary election more gratifying than it was to United States Senator George C. Perkins. Selected by the leaders of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League as one of the chief objects of their hostility they promoted his interests far more than was possible for his most intimate friends. By making him the storm centre of the campaign they evoked for him that which he could not otherwise have obtained—an expression of public confidence and esteem. If the Lincoln-Roosevelt League had not precipitated a contest with the avowed purpose of unseating Senator Perkins, and the regulars had won the conventional pallid and bloodless victory, we should not have known whether the Republicans of California really desired the re-election of Senator Perkins. But as the Leaguers exhorted the people to vote the anti-machine ticket for the purpose of defeating George C. Perkins, and as the people refused to do anything of the kind, compulsory becomes the inference that Perkins was what the people wanted, and so the Republicans in convention assembled endorsed Perkins for the job. In the circumstances the suspicion is not entirely unwarranted that the Lincoln-Roosevelt propaganda was nothing more than a Perkins movement in disguise. Indeed, there are some sagacious politicians who are of the opinion that it wouldn't have made much difference either to Perkins or the octopus how the election went. At any rate Senator Perkins didn't seem to worry much over the result. But Senator Perkins is one of those fortunate individuals who become known to posterity as men of destiny. His political career from a period antedating his term in the gubernatorial office comprises a long series of conquests achieved with hardly any more effort than was put forth in the primary election. And in that campaign he hardly made a ripple on the surface of things. Nowhere did he take the trouble to address his constituents. He did not even resent the attacks of his enemies. The Hon. F. J. Heney fulminating his loudest censures against Senator Perkins, with his usual felicity evolving certified facts from transparent fabrication, he was permitted to bloviate his way along without protest, and the result vindicated the wisdom of ignoring him.

The Artful Candidate

Commenting on Mr. Bryan's affirmative answer to his own question, "Shall the people rule?" Harper's Weekly says the same answer would doubtless be made by Mr. Taft "if that gentleman should consider it necessary to indulge in demagogic utterance." Evidently that gentleman does consider it necessary to indulge in demagogic utterance. Mr. Taft is an accomplished politician and he does not scorn the arts of his sponsor and preceptor. To be sure he is not so transparent in his demagoguery as Bryan. Unlike the Peerless One, who is utterly without scruple in his cajoleries, Mr. Taft is more inclined to dissipate than to indulge the wildest of the mob's delusions, but he is not above making concessions to some of the ill-founded prejudices of the populace. Even Harper's Weekly does not certify to his absolute artlessness. On the contrary, according to that influential journal, Mr. Taft does not dare to antagonize the supporters of Mr. Roosevelt. "He wants to get as far away as possible from the suspicion that he, too, may become a mere disturber of peace and upsetter of prosperity," and being certain "of getting the conservative vote in any case he does not hesitate to reassure the radicals." In other and less elegant language Mr. Taft is playing both ends against the middle. But we do not have to take the word of Harper's Weekly with reference to the demagogic motives of the Republican standard bearer. We can consult Mr. Taft himself and obtain verification on the point under discussion. In his notification speech Mr. Taft, in his discussion of the injunction topic, said: "The number of instances in which restraining orders without notice in industrial disputes have been issued by Federal Courts is small"; also, "The small number of cases complained of shows the careful manner in which most Federal judges have exercised the jurisdiction, but the belief that such cases are numerous has been so widespread that more definite specification in procedure to prevent recurrence of them is justified." From this we learn that Mr. Taft, the lawyer and statesman, thinks it advisable to advocate restrictive legislation because of a widespread and unfounded impression. Not an arrant demagogue himself, he is, however, quite willing that color should be given to the mischievous blatancies of the most tempestuous blatherskites of the tribe.

To Get Rid of the Philippines

Some of the newspapers of London and Paris are now discussing the probability of an alliance between this country and Germany, a counterpart of that which Great Britain has contracted with Japan. The motive for such a combination is not to be easily divined. The policies of this country and Germany in the Far East are as far apart as the poles, but it is of interest to note that the discussion has brought about the disclosure at Washington of a change of sentiment in regard to the Philippines. It was suggested that Germany might assist us in holding our Far Eastern possessions. But it appears that we do not want any assistance in holding the Philippines. On the contrary, it is said that the sooner we get rid of them the better. This is Mr. Roosevelt's sentiment and it is concurred in by many of the leading statesmen in Washington. Moreover, they believe that the coveted object can be attained within twenty years. How to get rid of them is a problem quite as perplexing as that which puzzled the man with the white elephant on his hands. It would be easy to dispose of them by putting them up at auction; and doubtless we could thus get more than our money back, but we are under certain moral obligations which we have not the courage to repudiate.

Neurotic Berkeley

From the Oakland Tribune we learn that some of the sincere and honorable reformers in the Lincoln-Roosevelt League of Alameda county are very much disgusted with the deceptions practiced by their associates from Berkeley. And we also learn that the Berkeley reformers are no longer in good standing in their own home. Repudiation is for them, even in Berkeley, for the college town is not entirely hysterical and irresponsible. It appears that the popular impression regarding neurotic Berkeley is somewhat erroneous. It numbers among its citizens many men of normal temperament who are not to be deceived by pedantic pretension and schoolmastery flubdub. Berkeley is not dominated by a combination of self-sufficiency and culturine. There is much sanity in the college town despite the enervating influence of the University under its present management. But the reformers are so demonstrative and noisy that they spread misapprehension respecting the character of the community. There is hope for Berkeley. There would be still greater hope were the politicians of the regular organization men with courage enough to abate the fountain of cant and hypocrisy that poisons the atmosphere of the university town.

Two Dramas

Socrates, unless an imperfect memory do him an injustice, was the inventor of conversational traps. Wishing to converse on some abstruse point of metaphysics, he would begin by obtaining the admission that two and two make four. Once granted that he would lead the unwary one into his trap. The only chance for the intended victim was to shun the trap by denying that, except in a very limited sense indeed, two and two do anything of the kind. The Bulletin's method is much simpler than the Socratic. The Bulletin begins its argument by assuming that you have kindly placed yourself within the trap. There is much to be said in favor of this method of dialectic. How nicely it works out was exemplified by our chaste contemporary in its recent editorial on "The Man of the Hour," designed to persuade us that the success of that play proves that public sentiment is still behind the graft prosecution. If it be true, says the Bulletin, with exquisite and positively withering sarcasm, that public sentiment in San Francisco is hostile to the prosecution, "why would it not pay the managers of the Van Ness to reverse 'The Man of the Hour,' and have the young Mayor sign the franchise and take the money or the Governorship as his reward?" The answer from which there is no escape is that the public are hostile to the higher-ups. The logic is flawless. Now let us see how the proposition was established. It was assumed that the guileless readers of the Bulletin admit that the graft prosecution drama and the stage drama are identical in motive, in problem and in plot. Of course there has been no such admission. The two dramas are as dissimilar as the Bulletin and an unboughten and incorruptible daily journal. In the stage drama the conflict is between an honest official and the rascals who would corrupt him. Virtue triumphs in strict accordance with the logical development of character and incident, and the spectator rejoices in the discomfiture of villainy. Far more complicated and involved is the plot of the graft drama. The main conflict in this drama doesn't involve graft at all. Graft figures only in the prologue, and then merely as the pretext for what follows. In the prologue we are made acquainted with the motive. The technique is somewhat after the style of Ibsen. Our first impression is that certain characters are heroic, civic patriots, intent on punishing a gang of infamous rascals, and they rouse our sympathy and admiration. But a little later we discover them to be canting hypocrites, vindictive rogues, masking selfish, sinister motives behind the most praiseworthy professions. As the plot unfolds we find these protagonists resorting to crimes more infamous than those which at first, apparently, had animated what we had conceived to be a laudable enterprise. Presently we see that the whole scheme of the drama is to make hypocrisy as repellant as possible and to impress the spectator with the danger of putting the machinery of justice into the hands of private individuals for the punishment of persons accused of crime. The conflict is not between a higher-up and an honest official, but between a gang of conspirators and the people of a State. The principle at issue is one that goes to the very root of the most important of all our institutions—the one through which justice is administered. We submit that briefly we have given an accurate, impartial analysis of the graft drama, and that from this analysis it is evident there is no analogy between the play at the Van Ness and the more stirring combination of dramatic incidents which we have had on our nerves for nearly two years. Obviously one may be perfectly consistent in applauding "The Man of the Hour" and hissing "The Great Conspiracy."

Judge Dunne's Happy Position

Of the men nominated for the Bench by the Independence League Judge Frank H. Dunne received the lowest vote. But in this circumstance there is not the slightest significance. There was keen competition for the nominations, each candidate's friends worked with energy and zeal, and neither merit nor consideration of the probable strength of the candidates before the people affected the deliberations of the Convention. Judge Dunne's candidacy was not weakened in the slightest degree by the circumstance of his being under a cloud in consequence of the petition for his punishment for contempt of court now pending in the Supreme Court. The fact is that apparently nobody is taking that petition seriously. And yet there is no division of sentiment among intelligent persons with reference to the gravity of the offense with which Judge Dunne is charged, or in respect of the action that should be taken by the Supreme Court in the event of his guilt being established to the satisfaction of that tribunal. Everybody of intelligence and sound understanding is sensible of the duty of the courts to command as well as to deserve the respect and confidence of the people. This is the paramount duty of the courts, since without the respect and confidence of the people our system of jurisprudence would be futile. Now it is conceded that there can be nothing urged in extenuation of such an offense as is charged against Judge Dunne. Peevish and querulous lawyers have been disbarred for uttering imputations against the Bench that cannot be adjudged more than trivial in comparison with those said to have been flung by Judge Dunne at the Court of Appeal. Are judges less amenable than lawyers to the ethics of the legal profession and to the rules prescribed for safeguarding the courts against ill repute? We have never been advised that judges are privileged to bring scandal on the judiciary by playing the part of the bird that fouls his own nest. But there is no need of speculation in this matter. Of the michievous impropriety of such conduct as has been attributed to Judge Dunne there is not the slightest doubt. And yet, as we have said, apparently nobody is taking seriously the petition for his punishment for contempt. Judge Dunne has been nominated by the Independence League and he will be nominated by the Democratic party. Nevertheless, it is possible for the Supreme Court to disbar him and render it impossible for him to sit on the bench. Moreover, there is not the slightest doubt that the extreme penalty fits the crime with which he is charged. And still, apparently, nobody is taking seriously the petition presented to the Supreme Court. It is interesting and instructive to inquire into this strange anomaly. The inquiry leads to no tedious ramifications. The attitude of the politicians toward Judge Dunne is inspired with the very same idea that is responsible for the prevailing opinion of the unimportance of the petition in the Supreme Court. According to this idea if Judge Dunne were treated as he deserves to be public opinion would ornament his brow with the crown of martyrdom. Many learned members of the bar, as well as the politicians, are of the opinion that condemnation of Judge Dunne, however just, however high the authority from which it may proceed, will prove michievous. At the same time nobody is able to conceive anything that can be said in his defense. Not even by way of plea in mitigation has anybody ascribed Judge Dunne's gratuitous and brutal slander against the Court of Appeal to impulsive indiscretion. Those who object to his punishment admit that his monumental ignorance unfits him for the bench, but they are convinced that to defeat him the politicians must nominate him, and they hope the Supreme Court will refrain from upholding one of the sacred principles uopn which our system of justice rests. We fully understand the reluctance of these prudent and learned members of the legal profession. It is based on the assumption in which was grounded a very old religious distinction between the esoteric and the exoteric, the assumption that the truth is the privilege of the few and edification the only claim and right of the many; that sound doctrine is for the clergy and safe doctrine for the laity. How fortunate for Judge Dunne that it is deemed advisable to apply this distinction in his case! And how humiliating the reflection on public opinion which it involves! But we are candid enough to say that it does not meet with our approval. We would much prefer to see Judge Dunne receive the crown of martyrdom at the hands of the people, to see the people in their purblind ignorance rebuke those who do their duty, rather than see a rogue in soiled ermine go unwhipt of justice. This we say in no spirit of vindictiveness. No misfortune that may attend Judge Dunne can afford us the slightest gratification. It would not displease us were his removal from the bench to prove advantageous to him by opening to him some channel of fortune through which he might achieve the highest possible earthly success. But it would displease us most poignantly to witness an exhibition in the Supreme Court of such moral cowardice as that which is advocated by certain learned members of the legal profession. Even if we were to construe public opinion as they do, to the discredit of the intelligence of the community, we should not deem it expedient to ignore Judge Dunne's scurrilous abuse of the Court of Appeal. Nor do we believe the Supreme Court will do so. We have faith in the judgment, the intelligence and the honesty of that tribunal. We do not believe it will ignore the petition in the Dunne case. We believe that even a tribunal of less intelligence than that which distinguishes our Supreme Court, were it inclined in similar circumstances to overlook such misconduct as has been charged against Judge Dunne, would be recalled to its senses by the insulting attitude of the District Attorney's office toward the Court of Appeal in the Creely case. Here we see exemplified the evil of indulging pettifoggers of the bar in the notion that courts may with impunity be treated with disdain. Indubitably the notion prevails in the District Attorney's office that the courts have been so bitterly assailed by the incendiaries of journalism that they have become too timid to perform their sworn duties. This is the situation that has been brought about in the interest of reform and good government.

A Bit of Clerical Humor

A Maori bishop attending a religious conference in the East says that if we had a law compelling all divorced persons to have a certain design tattoed on their chin the divorce evil would soon be checked. The good bishop evidently does not apprehend the extent of the evil. The law which he suggests would only serve to make tattooed chins fashionable. But perhaps the good bishop is only joking. For even bishops can afford to joke about the divorce evil, which is one of the funniest of the many curious consequences of the beneficent innovations made upon religion by learned theologians. The divorce evil is coevil with the birth of religious freedom, its development has kept pace with the multiplication of the jarring sects, and it has developed into a social monster which is not to be destroyed by legislation. To attempt to regulate it by making it disreputable is absurd. As the principle of it is recognized by the Christian religions, why should those who avail themselves of that principle be stigmatized? According to the religious view there is nothing disgraceful in an honest divorce obtained for just cause any more than there is in the amputation of a limb after an accident. Obviously, in the circumstances it would be most unjust to put the brand of infamy on everybody who has been divorced. It is wrong to punish anybody for doing that which is legitimate.

Sankey as a Singing Revivalist

By Harvey Sterne

Ira D. Sankey, the great singing evangelist, lived so quietly during the past few years that very few people knew he was alive and the announcement of his death came as a general surprise. His name will always be coupled with that of Dwight L. Moody, the unordained preacher, whose work was crowned with so many signs of success. A generation ago these men were the heart and soul of the greatest religious revivals in the land. Moody was the preacher and Sankey led the singing and the fervor they aroused was extraordinary. For a quarter of a century they were the dominant figures in religious revivals all over the United States, England and Scotland. Hosts of converts were made by them. Mr. Moody was once asked if he had ever kept any records of them. "Records," he exclaimed, "why they are kept in Heaven." Their lives were brimful of wide and profound experiences of keen human interest. Nothing illustrates the sincere and direct character of the two men so much as the story of their meeting and the partnership in saving souls which followed. Both of them always regarded the meeting as Providential. When he was thirty years old Mr. Sankey went from his Pennsylvania home to Indianapolis as a delegate to an international Young Men's Christian Association convention. At that time Mr. Moody had begun his evangelical work and was to address a morning meeting of the session. Mr. Sankey had arrived late and was sitting near the door. He was asked by a minister who knew of his singing to start something when the prayer was ended. After the service Moody sought out the singer. Here is Mr. Sankey's story of what followed: "Moody's first words to me were, 'Where are you from? What is your business? Are you married?' I told him that I lived in Pennsylvania, that I was married and had two children and was in the government employ. 'You will have to give that up,' he said abruptly. 'What for,' I said amazed. 'To come to Chicago and help me with my work,' was the answer. 'But I can't leave my business in that way,' I answered. 'You must,' he retorted. 'I have been looking for you for eight years.' The two men prayed over the matter and afterwards corresponded for six months. Then Mr. Sankey went to Chicago to visit Mr. Moody for a week. Within a few days he resigned his government position and cast his life's work with Mr. Moody.

Mr. Sankey had a rich, deep baritone voice, and had a power of expressing feelings that deeply moved those who heard him. No one could hear him sing "O, Where Is My Wandering Boy, To-Night?" without having the emotions profoundly stirred. It was always an open question whether his singing or Mr. Moody's straightforward talking had the greater effect on the audiences. One of Mr. Sankey's greatest successes was the hymn, "The Ninety and Nine." He made it famous. Its origin was curious. In 1874, while traveling from Glasgow to Edinburgh he bought a penny weekly paper on the train in the hopes of finding some news about America. Before throwing down the paper some verses in the corner of a page caught his eye. They were signed by Miss Elizabeth C. Clephane. He read them to Mr. Moody and said they would make a beautiful hymn if properly set to music. Mr. Moody was very much preoccupied at the time with some correspondence and paid very little attention to what was said. Mr. Sankey sat silent for a time: then he cut the poem out of the paper and slipped it into his vest pocket. The next day at the meeting in Edinburgh Dr. Bonar spoke on the subject of "The Good Shepherd." At the end of the sermon Mr. Moody turned to Mr. Sankey and asked him if he had an appropriate hymn to close the service. "I seemed to hear a voice say, 'Sing the hymn you found on the train,'" said Mr. Sankey afterwards. "But I thought it was impossible to do so as no music had ever been written to the words. But again the impression to sing the words swept over me more strongly than ever, so almost mechanically I drew the slip from my pocket and placed it on the organ in front of me. As I did so I lifted my heart in prayer, asking God to help me to sing so that the people might hear and understand. Laying my hands on the organ I struck the key of A flat, and began to sing. Note by note the tune was given and it has not been changed from that day to this. As the song ceased a great sigh seemed to go up from the meeting and I knew that song had reached the hearts of the Scotch audience. Mr. Moody was greatly moved. Leaving the pulpit he came down to where I was seated. Leaning over the organ he looked at the newspaper clipping and with tears in his eyes said, 'Sankey, where did you get that hymn? I never heard the like of it in my life.' I was also moved to tears and replied, 'Mr. Moody, that's the hymn I read to you yesterday when you were so busy.' Mr. Moody raised his hand and pronounced the benediction." Thus "The Ninety and Nine" was born.

Though Mr. Sankey's singing was a great feature of the gatherings there were occasions in the old Covenanter' corners of Scotland when even he himself was dubious about the character of its reception. He used to play his own accompanyment on a little cabinet organ which was taken wherever he went. Some of these old Scotch congregations had never sung anything but the Psalms of David and the little organ was regarded by them as "a Kist of Whustles." At one of these meetings while Mr. Sankey was singing a solo the shrill voice of a woman rang out in wild tones, "Let me out! Let me out! What would John Knox think of the like o' ye?" But the 'whustles' and Sankey's moving hymns won by degrees.

A prominent Brooklyn divine once made the following estimate of Mr. Sankey's gifts: "If ever a man was raised and endowed for a special work by our Divine Master, that man was Ira D. Sankey. His work was of a twofold character. Before his day psalms and hymns and spiritual songs had always been an important part of the services of religious worship throughout Christendom. But he introduced a peculiar style of popular hymns which were calculated to awaken the hardened and to guide inquiring souls. In the next place he sang these powerful revival hymns himself, and became as effective a preacher of the gospel of salvation by song as his associate, D. L. Moody, was by sermon."

Both revivalists were quick at repartee and loved an occasional jest. Mr. Gladstone, accompanied by several prominent members of the House of Lords dropped into a London meeting one day. At the conclusion of the regular address Mr. Moody met them. In the course of the conversation Mr. Gladstone glanced at Mr. Moody's superb physique and said, "You have a fine body for your profession." "Yes," replied Mr. Moody quickly, "if I only had your head on it." At one of the inquiry meetings Mr. Sankey asked a handsome looking stranger as he was leaving the meeting if he was a Christian. "No," he replied," I am a Missourian." On an occasion when the train was on the way to Chicago it stopped at a small town where quite a large crowd was assembled at the station. Mr. Moody silently regarded the people through the window for a minute, then he asked a gaunt looking countryman in the foreground the cause of the assemblage. "Oh, nothing much," was the reply, "the folks have just come down to take a look at the cars." "Then you didn't hear that General Grant was on the train?" asked Moody quizzically. "Oh, is he?" said the man, brightening, and becoming very much interested. "No," said Mr. Moody, with a broad smile. Quite nonplused, the man walked down the platform and was lost in the crowd for awhile. Presently he returned and said, "Hello, mister, we had a great time in town last night." "How was that?" inquired Mr. Moody, brightening up in his turn. "There was a woman here and they wouldn't bury her." "Wouldn't bury her?" repeated Mr. Moody, "and why not?" "Because she wasn't dead." The man grinned and the crowd roared. Mr. Moody settled back in his seat. "Sankey," he said, "we'd better pull down the window."

A Case Without Precedent

By Federico de Roberto

As the carriages drew up before the entrance of the house in course of construction, and disgorged the seconds, with their bundle of swords wrapped up in an old piece of faded green cloth that once had covered a gaming table, the company gathered in the Terminal Cafe directly opposite, across the square, became excited.

"There they are! There they are, over there!"

"Have they all come?" asked Monterani.

"All but the marquis. Seethere, isn't that Dr. Salandri?"

All eyes were riveted in that direction, even the waiter, with his napkin over his arm, stood craning his neck in the doorway.

"What is the duel about?" inquired Corsi, the lawyer. "Can anyone tell me that?"

"No mystery about that. Luzzi made himself too agreeable to the marquise."

"And her husband could hit on nothing more original than to send him a challenge?"

"By the way," interrupted Monterani, turning to Baldassare Gargano, who had not yet opened his lips, "were you not asked by the marquis to serve as second?"

"Yes, but I could not accept."

"If the question is not indiscreet, what was your reason?"

"I made a vow, the last time that I was involved in an affair of honor, never again to serve as second for anyone."

"Why so? What had happened to you?"

"It was a scene that I shall not forget to the last day of my life."

"Was one of the principals killed?"

"On the contrary, the duel never took place."

"Well, then, why——?"

"Tell about it! Go ahead, tell about it!" they all insisted with one voice.

"First of all," began Baldassare Gargano, "you must know the reason for the challenge. It was in Rome, one night, at the Sport Club, where I had dropped in quite casually for want of something better to do. I had glanced through the daily papers, chatted for a while with a few acquaintances, and passed on into the billiard room, when I noticed, leaning against one side of the doorway and almost hidden by the portiere, Count Von Bauern—the son, you know, of the Saxon minister.

"Ordinarily a meeting with him would not have stirred me one way or another; but the count had lately suffered a great bereavement, the death of his young wife, whom he had fairly worshipped during life, and still mourned inconsolably. The sad event, which came as a shock to all those who had known the countess, was not so very recent; it dated back perhaps five or six months. Nevertheless, this was the first time that the heartbroken husband had reappeared in public. This fact in itself gives you some idea of the intensity of his grief, the ravages of which I discovered, as soon as I saw the count, in his bowed form and his haggard features. The mourning of his outer garments was a true reflection of the mourning of his soul—of how many widowers do you suppose one may say as much? The fact is that the Countess Von Bauern, this gentle lady so early snatched away, united in herself all the qualities likely to render a man happy, if happiness is to be found at all in the present world. Beauty, grace, culture, nobility of birth and character, perfect dignity—all these she had. And I doubt whether a new Pygmalion, moulding to suit himself the partner with whom he would share his life, could make one any nearer to perfection.

"Nothing can avert fate. That evening the indisposition of Mme. Nevosky had necessitated the postponement of the opera and the foul weather out of doors offered a difficult problem to a good many men, how they were to pass the evening. Little by little a noisy crowd had gathered at the club, with Rodolfo Vialli at their head, a rattle-brained fellow, of lighter weight than the ashes on the end of his cigarette. They were gossiping at first, commenting on the illness of the songstress, making some sort of a wager; and then all at once Vialli, choosing for his opponent a certain Ansaldi, whose one idea in life was music, dragged him off by the arm to the billiard room. Curiosity drove me in the same direction. The game began in the midst of a steady influx of new arrivals.

"If you should ask me," resumed the narrator, "how the talk glided little by little from a question of art into out-and-out slander, I couldn't satisfy your curiosity. You know how it happens. One word draws out another. The starting point is plain enough, but no one can foresee the end. They were speaking of a recent scandal affecting a family moving in the highest circles; one of the usual domestic dramas, the husband suddenly having his eyes opened, the wife deserting the conjugal roof, in order to follow her lover. It was Vialli who exclaimed, in reference to the lover: 'Poor Geppino, what a load to be saddled with! Such affairs seem at first like paradise, just as it seemed like paradise to Sapho's lover to carry her up stairs in his arms. But on reaching the top, he was ready to die from weariness.' I have forgotten who rejoined: 'If you create a situation like that, you must face the consequences.' 'I am not denying it,' Vialli replied slowly, while he considered whether his better shot was to aim for the white ball or the red: 'I am not denying it, but doing one's duty is not always a joyous matter.' Then, missing his carom: 'To the devil with duty. The really lucky man is the one who knows how to break off in season.' Ansaldi also missed his shot. 'Now for my revenge,' said Vialli; then, irritated by a second failure, he exclaimed: 'For a man to get his freedom as Augusto Stecchi did, from Von Bauern's wife, is a piece of luck that does not happen every day.'

"My friends, I do not know how to tell you all that I felt at that moment. What was it Vialli meant to say? Von Bauern's wife? Or had I misunderstood? He had barely uttered that name, when my eyes automatically sought the portiere behind which I had earlier seen the count. He was still there, quite hidden except for his eyes; but those eyes gleamed as though they were made of phosphorus. Were the others aware, as I was, of his presence?

"There are moments when a tragic fatality seems to weigh us down; moments when we perceive clearly all that is happening around us, and yet feel, as in a nightmare, the absolute impossibility of raising a finger to stay the course of events. At present I can say all this; but at the time I could not even think the smallest part of it. 'Augusto Stecchi,' Vialli continued, throwing down his cue, 'was a very lucky man to be set free from her—'

"Ah, what a scene, what a horrible scene! He had not finished speaking, when the floor rang under a tread that made everyone in that small gathering turn around, and Count Von Bauern, like a fantastic sceptre, advanced upon Vialli. Not one of us moved. I, for my part, fairly held my breath. When the count had come close to the billiardist, he said in a voice like strident ice—if you will let the phrase pass—that rings in my ears even yet: 'You are a liar and a coward!' Like the recoiling of a spring Vialli turned on him with raised cue, but the count, in a flash, had snatched it from his hold, hurling the man

The Shocking of Simpkins

Some men are never so startled as when accosted by a newspaper reporter and told that they are to be interviewed. For every man who is not a nonentity has done something which would not look nice to him in print, and no man can be quite sure that what he has done has not leaked out. Harry Simpkins is no exception. Now Mr. Simpkins, as everybody knows, recently figured in a rough-house farce with Harry Scott in the Burlingame Club. The Examiner desiring the details of the affair, sent Sidney Robertson out to get Mr. Simpkins' version. Mr. Robertson is a somewhat impetuous reporter, who doesn't think any more of an interview than Mr. Hearst does of the Iroquois Club. He breaks the news of his professional purpose as unconcernedly as he would ask for a match. "I've come to get that story," was the abrupt announcement which he made to Harry Simpkins and Harry behaved like a man who'd been hit with a bungstarter. "My God!" he exclaimed, "you're not going to publish that story, are you?"

"Sure!" said Robertson. "I've brought an artist along to sketch you."

"Great Scott!" Simpkins ejaculated, as he mopped the beads from his brow.

"I'll interview him after I'm through with you," said Robertson. "I hear it was a pretty hot fight."

"Oh," said Simpkins, a light breaking on his mental faculties, and his emotions quickly subsiding, "that's the story you want."

"Yes," said Robertson, "the story about the fight."

"Sit right down and I'll tell you all about it," said Simpkins, and now Robertson is curious to know what the other story is.

Why Did Metcalf Sequester Himself?

Rumors are abroad that there is not the best of feeling between Secretary of the Navy Victor H. Metcalf, and his former colleague, William H. Taft. It is said that Taft likes Metcalf personally, but does not have a high opinion of his political sagacity; that Metcalf, on his part, has an idea that the President has exalted Taft beyond the merits of that stout gentleman. However, it was a matter of general remark during the Republican State Convention at Oakland that Metcalf did not put in an appearance at any time during the proceedings. He was not only in Oakland, but spent the larger portion of his time in the Athenian Club, which is not more than a block away from the Liberty Theatre in which the convention was being held. It was remarked that Metcalf could have done a very handsome thing for his former colleague, and at the same time have advertised himself extensively by making a short address to the convention, urging the Republicans to get together and roll up a big majority for Taft and Sherman. The convention would have been glad to hear from him and had he made a speech of the character suggested it would have been sent broadcast over the country, and it would have served as notice that the Secretary of the Navy was still politically alive and doing something for Republican success in November. But Metcalf lost the golden opportunity and was not heard from while the convention was in session. Was his failure to appear due to the lack of harmony between him and the Republican candidate for President?

The Magic of Wealth

"Of course," says the Examiner, "it's funny to find a man pretending to be invited everywhere when he is seldom invited anywhere." This observation was made apropos of Joe Redding's story of a puerile deception in which the Hon. James D. Phelan was recently caught. It is a very amusing story and it will probably haunt Mr. Phelan in all the years of his erring pilgrimage through life. But in spite of its serviceableness as an index to the character of our distinguished young millionaire it will not impair his standing in society. For the present, it is true, Mr. Phelan is persona non grata in circles where once he was welcome. True, he is not circulating so freely and joyously as was his wont. Seldom nowadays is he titillated by the noisy praise of giddy throngs. Opportunities for public speechmaking at banquets and routs in his beloved home have become few and far between. But the pariahood of Mr. Phelan will not be of long duration. As the immortal bard tells us "If money go before all ways do lie open." Mr. Phelan has an abundance of the stuff "which buys admittance and makes Diana's rangers false themselves." Several years ago Prince Poniatowski solemnly asserted that to no gentleman's home could Mr. Phelan obtain admission. That was the sincere utterance of a man who had learned that Mr. Phelan was slyer than Ulysses, that he was as expert in changing his shape as Neptune's herdsman, as facile as a chameleon in varying his complexion and not inferior to Machiavel in the art of dissimulatoion. But Prince Poniatowski's conception of the exclusiveness of a gentleman's house was absurdly inaccurate. Since the utterance of Prince Poniatowski's oracular dictum Mr. Phelan has dined in all sorts of houses. A man with Phelan's money can live down anything. With the Examiner publishing every day a picture of Mr. Phelan haunted by a balloon which was said to symbolize the part he played in a Paris episode, he had himself accepted as a reformer in San Francisco and invited to churches and to women's clubs to preach morality and civic virtue.

In "The Gay White Way"

When Camille D'Arville, who is known in Oakland as Mrs. Crellin, after a few years of matrimonial bliss wandered back to the stage, it was said that while the footlights' glare had not lost its charm for her, it no longer held her in thrall; that she had divorced herself from her art, but intended to keep on speaking terms therewith. But now it appears that Mrs. Crellin is as ardently devoted to the stage as ever, and that the alienation of her affections by Cupid was but a temporary affair, for Camille D'Arville's talents are as available for theatrical purposes as ever. The latest report in reference to her doings is that she has been engaged to play in "The Gay White Way," with Jefferson De Angelis and Emma Carus.

The Mystification of Muir

John Muir is not a near-psychic nor an investigator of occult forces, but he recently told a friend that he was keen for an explanation of a curious experience that he had in the Yosemite Valley. Ever since he went to college, he said, there had existed a very strong tie of friendship between himself and the professor who instructed him in botany. One day last year while climbing up to his cabin in the mountains he heard a voice calling him. His name distinctly floated up through the forest. He recognized the voice as that of his old friend, the professor, and he answered, but he heard nothing more. Then it occurred to him that what he thought was a call was an hallucination, but so strange was the effect upon him that he retraced his footsteps. Down he went into the valley and to the hotel, where he examined the register and found the name of his friend. When they met Muir told the story of his experience and attributed the mystic occurrence to telepathy, saying "I suppose you were thinking of me and wanted to see me." But the professor added to the mystery by saying, "Why, I had no thought of meeting you. I thought you were still in China."

Muir Played Hookey

John Muir has won great distinction as a mountain climber, but one of the achievements of his career which he recalls with great gusto has never been recorded. Once upon a time Muir climbed beyond the reach of E. H. Harriman and it is that performance to which I refer. It was one of the incidents of the trip to Alaska when Muir and several other scientists were the guests of the railroad magnate. Harriman's chaplain was a member of the party and religious services were held regularly. Mr. Harriman expected his guests to attend the services, and they did, but one day Mr. Muir, who is an individualist in religious matters, preferring to pay his respects to his Creator in his own way, mutinied. At the sound of the chapel bell the mountaineer surreptitiously withdrew and climbed to the top of the smoker. There he remained throughout the services, enjoying the scenery and doubtless experiencing all the religious rapture that scenery inspires in those whose appreciation of the beautiful is more than skin deep.

"You officeholders," sneered the man who was vainly trying to be one, "don't die very often do you?"
"No," replied the man who was one, as he smiled benignly; "only once."

"Take That!" Say the Suffragists

The Equal Suffrage Association has come right out in meeting and rebuked the Republican party of this State for refusing to consider woman's right to vote. If they had been members of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League they could not have been handed a jucier specimen of the citrus belt. And now some of the grave and dignified members of the suffrage association are wondering whether it would not have been better to have used some other procedure with the Republican convention. The ladies marshaled themselves in their fluffiest bib and tucker with the intent of giving optical proof that suffrage does not spell either lack of beauty or of style. The Republicans were so impressed that they trotted out a special set of pink tea manners and never forgot to pass the sugar with the tongs. Many of the suffragists now feel that they were not taken seriously enough, and they wonder whether the latest in millinery may not have undermined their chances. Chairman Dozier, who before the end of the convention had learned to roll a pretty pill and sugar coat it as brightly as an Italian chocolate is tinseled, is very much aggrieved because the suffragists made a motion to censure him. As he was the man who made the motion for a vote of thanks to be tendered to the ladies for their presence at the convention he feels that he might have expected better treatment. The suffragists refused to swallow the vote of thanks in lieu of the suffrage plank which they so ardently desired and now they have gone still further and condemned Dozier and his fellow Republicans as "unfair and dishonest men."

Hawaii's Great Harvest Event

My Honolulu correspondent writes that one of the largest social affairs undertaken in Hawaii for years, was recently given by the Baldwins of Maui in connection with the Harvest Home Festival at the Hawaiian Commercial and Sugar Company's plantation. This festival is an annual affair and is held August 12th, which is shortly after the completion of the plantation's cane harvest. This year it netted something over $4,000,000. It is also the anniversary of the transfer of the sovereignty of these islands to the United States. The festival includes a great luau, dancing, and a tennis tournament. It is the star affair of its kind on Maui , and is attended by everybody on the Island.

The Baldwins as Hosts

This year the tennis tournament was made an inter-island affair, an inter-island polo tournament was added, and guests were invited from all the other islands. Inviting guests from the other islands to such an affair means providing for them for there are no hotels or anything of that sort. The Baldwins got up the affair, issued the invitations and provided for the guests. It was an immense house party, something over sixty guests being provided for. Automobiles met them at the steamer landings, and whisked them over good roads to the quarters that had been provided for them. There are a number of Baldwins, and Baldwin connections, and friends and acquaintances were distributed among them and thus cared for. The entertainment lasted three days and included a trip to the crater of Haleakala and luaus at the Raymond and the Cornwell ranches, with horses and automobiles and carriages to take the guests everywhere.

"I had to sell my auto, but I haven't missed it yet."
"How's that?"
"Oh, I can get most of the sensations by cleaning rugs."

Light Shed by the Collegiate Alumnae

The Collegiate Alumnae convention held this week in San Francisco has impressed me with the fact that but few of our society women are college graduates. On the eastern collegiate scroll are inscribed any number of gilded names, but as yet there has been no forward movement here in the matter of sending girls with latent social possibilities to college. A finishing school with its finicky instruction in the social amenities of life, and its half-baked mental offering is considered good enough for a girl born with a hard hammered silver spoon. Whatever else the fashionable private schools do for girls, it is noteworthy that they do not teach them the rudiments of grammar and spelling. The other day I read twenty or thirty notes of congratulation sent to a young society girl who has recently announced her engagement. The antics of the adjectives, the quarrels between the pronouns and their antecedents would have discredited a child in the public grammar school. Several of the notes were pertly witty, many were positively clever in spots, but not one was correctly or happily phrased throughout. No doubt the cost of educating these young women would endow a school, and yet they have not had the educational advantage of the average American girl.

Local College Women in Society

It is rather difficult to accept any theory on the mental indifference of the social elect unless it be that higher mathematics often curdle a peaches and cream complexion, and in computing matroimonial chances a complexion frequently makes the account show an encouraging balance. Or it may be that the objection is rooted in the fact that if a girl delays her formal introduction to society until she has acquired a college degree she is handicapped by several years seniority over the other girls in her set. In the East girls are not "coming out" as young as they do out here, and so the eastern college girl is not so apt to be handicapped. To be sure Miss Ethel Roosevelt will make her debut at seventeen but that is because she wants to go down in history as a White House debuntante. On the other hand, Miss Helen Taft, who is entered at Wellesley College, does not intend to give up her college education for a social career at the White House. Mrs. Walter Magee, Miss Elizabeth Livermore, and perhaps at a wide margin, half a dozen other young women in the Greenway set have college degrees. In the large eastern cities the percentage of society women who have had a college education is much larger.

Frowned Upon by Army Officers

The local army posts are very much exercised over the shooting of William E. Annis by Captain Haines. Many of the officers believe that the trial of the case will only contribute another of those wretched scandals that have shocked conservative army circles of late. Though Captain Haines fired the shots, his brother, Thornton Jenkins Haines, who kept Annis' friends at bay till the murder was accomplished, has become the central figure in the tragedy. Thornton Jenkins is said to possess a great influence over his brother and to have instigated him to commit the crime. The police investigation places him in an Iago light and credits him with writing the letters charging Annis with invading the sanctuary of the Haines home and misleading the wife while the husband was absent in the Philippines.

A Cause Celebre

Each brother has killed his man. Turbulent blood runs in the Haines family and fighting blood, too. It is a heritage from both the maternal and paternal sides, but till Thornton Haines killed his chum, Ned Hannagan, in 1891, the fighting proclivities of the Haines' never brought anything but honor to the family. The killing of Hannagan has been productive of much discussion in the criminal history of the East and has always been a cause celebre. Young Haines and Hannagan were inseparable friends up to the time of the shooting. They associated with young army and navy officers at Hampton Roads and were supposed to be in the midst of the gay life there. Their chief recreation was boating and sailing: they were on a sailing trip when the tragedy occurred. Nobody knew what the quarrel was about, if there was one. The prosecuting attorney tried hard to find a reason for the shooting by canvassing among their women acquaintances, but he found nothing. He was forced to the explanation that Haines killed his friend out of pure bad temper. He discovered that all his life Haines had been violent tempered, dictatorial, vindictive and vengeful. The prosecuting attorney frankly told the jury that there was no motive for the crime: that it was the work of a man so egotistical that he would kill if his whims were not respected. For many years after his discharge, Thornton Haines was tabooed by the Baltimore clubs, though his father and brothers were always welcome.

He—"Don't worry about the boxes."
She—"But if they don't come I'll have nothing to wear tonight."
He—"Well, that's nothing—your loss will be our gain."

The Last Whack of Fate

He was a lanky, middle aged, roughly clad Italian and he walked into a precinct registration bureau in the Latin Quarter the other day, with the air of a man indifferent to the next move of implacable Fate. He wanted to register in order to vote at the Presidential election next November, and the first order shot at him by the deputy was to produce his naturalization papers. "Pape!" he repeated blankly. "Ah, I losa da fire." "No papers, no vote," was the laconic answer. "Sapristi!" he ejaculated, bristling, "I losa de pape: I losa de job: I losa da wife an' da frien'. Now I losa da vote. Per Paccho! I no losa no more. I go backa da Italia: I grinda da org." And he did. And his compatriots said the next day that he had left the city.

Curious Praise for a Vocalist

Mr. Thomas Nunan of the Examiner has discovered a vocal artist of rare ability, a Miss Anita Parker of Mill Valley, who has studied music in Boston, the city of culture. He isn't sure that she is as great as she seems, but in support of his wavering judgment he quotes an impresario from Los Angeles, a Mr. Bechymer, who says: "She looks like Ellen Beach Yaw, she stands like Yaw, she acts like Yaw and she sings better than Yaw." This to Mr. Nunan is praise of the very highest order. He assures us that in the present state of his judgment he would hardly go so far. Which causes me to wonder whether Nunan ever heard Yaw sing or whether he has formed a conception of that singer's ability on the strength of what the Philistines have said of her. Ellen Beach Yaw is regarded as a great singer in Boston and Los Angeles, but in none of the other great cities of the earth. She is a freak vocalist and squeezes out a high note, thin and colorless, and of no value for musical purposes. It may be intended for praise to compare the singing of a budding young soprano to the singing of Ellen Beach Yaw, but it is something quite different. It is like comparing a young contralto to a veteran female baritone. There are many contraltos who can make a noise like a baritone, as there are are also many sopranos who can make a noise like Ellen Beach Yaw, but they prefer not to.

She—Doesn't coffee ever make you nervous?

He—Not unless I've got a lot of money in it on a falling market. Then the weaker it is the more nervous it makes me.

Stevens Is Now a Star

There are two devils plaving on Broadway, and one of them is from California. The California devil is Edwin Stevens, who has been exalted to stardom. This in itself is an event of some importance, and one that provokes to speculation respecting the reasons why this talented and versatile actor was compelled for many years to languish in comparative obscurity while men of far lesser ability—in some instances, mere novices—were raised to the first rank in the army of Thespis. But perhaps more interesting than speculation is the story of the be-deviling of Broadway and of the introduction of Stevens as a star. Nothing has created more interest in the theatrical world of late than the simultaneous production of two adaptations of a Hungarian play called "The Devil." One adaptation was made for Harrison Grey Fiske, and the other was made for Henry W. Savage. Each manager claims the exclusive American rights, and Fiske undertook to get a copyright on the strength of the first presentation of the play. He engaged George Arliss to play the devil and after organizing a company held surreptitious rehearsals in a small town near New York. Savage didn't get wind of Fiske's strategic purpose until the eleventh hour, and then he communicated with Edwin Stevens, who was on Nantucket Island, by wireless. Mr. Stevens chartered a steamboat which took him to Wood Hole, where he caught an express train to New York. Arriving in the city, he was met by an automobile which conveyed him straight to the Garden Theatre, where all night rehearsals had been in progress. Mr. Savage kept the company hard at work until daylight. There was a short interval for breakfast, then the company went back to work and plugged away until 7 o'clock. A little after 8 o'clock the theatre was packed to the doors, and the performance began. At the same hour the performance of the Fiske company was begun at the Belasco Theatre.

The Devil's Epigrams

Both adaptations of the play are essentially the same as to the general theme. The play is realistic symbolism. The devil in both plays puts aside his tail, horns and cloven hoofs, dons a smartly tailored frock coat, sticks a monocle in his eye, walks abroad among men, a human prototype of all the worst that lies in man, the epitome of everything evil and ugly and damnable that from childhood we have been taught to abhor and hate. The devil is an epigrammatic fellow. Here are some of his cynical sentiments:

A real wife is always the other man's wife.

A life that has not been squandered has not been lived.

Forgive me, Madame, for opening my eyes at a moment when, for propriety's sake, I should have at least kept one eye shut.

I once had a similar encounter at a dentist's—and the lady, to prove that my insinuations were false, did not hesitate to sacrifice a perfectly good tooth.

Only two people in the world may open the door of a bachelor's apartment to a young lady—the man servant—or a clergyman with a marriage certificate.

My name? To let you into a little secret, I am a citizen of the world. I'm a philanthropist traveling incog—a multimillionaire whose consuming ambition is to do good and die poor. It keeps me awake at nights, and I often fall asleep in the daytime from sheer exhaustion. Charity with me is a passion and it taxes my ingenuity. Sometimes I put up the price of coal; with the profits I found infirmaries for the freezing poor. I have been known to cut the wages of my employes for the pure pleasure of establishing soup kitchens. I am an author, too. "Experimental Matrimony," "The Protective Tariff as a Means of Grace," "Salvation Through Success"—ah! I see you recognize the titles.

A woman's "What time is it?" in these circumstances means always a husband. The wife's instinct aprises her of her husband's return exactly ten minutes before his coming. It is a highly moral instinct, since it lessens the number of divorces.

The candle burns, flickers, goes out. But at least it has burned. What men call a code of ethics was devised by the strong in order that they might rule the weak. The strong, the successful, take good care not to live up to it themselves.

I tell you life is a treasure only when you spend it freely.

Consider how stupid it would be if every one told the truth. Why, there'd be no conversation.

She does not love her husband. Her husband, therefore, is either a very common fellow or a genius. The unloved husband is always one or the other.

ticular star of the Tivoli, by right of talent. She was a native daughter, born in Suisun, graduated from Mills College, and made her theatrical debut under Barrett and McCullough at the old Bush Street Theatre, in 1878. She showed unusual talent from the start and took a leading place with such promising players in the production as Alice Harrison, Charlie Bishop and Tom Keene. The play was "A Trip to the Moon," and Keene played the comedy part of the Microscope. So great was Gracie Plaisted's success that Kiralfy took her East in the same production, which he put on the road. When she returned here it was as the prima donna of the Emily Melville Opera Company. She was the Prince, and Helen Dingeon, who died recently, was the Princess in "Methusalem." Gracie Plaisted possessed a rich and very sweet soprano voice and her natural vivacity, tireless energy, rare good humor and clever acting made her a general favorite. She was very small, weighing less than a hundred pounds, very slender and very dainty and possessed the art in a high degree of winning friends by her personal charm of manner. Emily Melville considered her invaluable in light opera and gave her special inducements to join her company on an Australian tour. So successful was the venture in the Antipodes that the company remained there eight years. Later the success was duplicated in China and Japan.

In Theatricals to the End

On her return here she joined the Tivoli company and remained with them five years. Then she went into the dramatic stock under Jack Stevens at the old Dewey Theatre, in Oakland. In 1900, she started out on the road again in musical comedies under the management of Charles Blaney. At the time of the big fire she was living with her husband in the Galindo Hotel in Oakland, where she gathered and cared for all the theatrical refugees she could find. A few months ago she took up theatrical work again with the Blunkall company at the Lyric Theatre in Portland. A growing heart trouble obliged her to close her engagement and she returned to her home in Alameda where the malady in a short time carried her away. She was married three times. Her first husband was Albert Lancaster, whose family was wealthy and resided in Vallejo. Mrs. A. M. Funke of Alameda is a daughter of that marriage. She married George Bartlett at the time she was playing at the Dewey Theatre and her husband and her daughter were among the many mourners at her at her funeral.

"Per-oxide, you mean."

The Prophet from Berkeley

Now comes Professor Boke, saner, sounder, farther sighted, deeper fathoming than the rest of us, and with the characteristic cocksureness of the schoolmaster, laying down as irrefragable the proposition that "Honest men cannot differ upon principles of right, of truth, of justice." Not strictly by syllogistic procedure, but loosely and not in the most coherent fashion Professor Boke, starting with this proposition as one of his premises comes to the conclusion, vaguely hinted, that none but dishonest men dissent from his views with reference to the Graft Prosecution. Professor Boke is a very unreasonable as well as a superficial philosopher. Cardinal Newman has said that a well educated man is too wise to be dogmatical or fanatic. Obviously, Professor Boke is not too wise. He may be conscious of the weakness of human reason, but not of his own, and therefore, I am perhaps justified in saying of him as Socrates said of Antisthenes, "I see your vanity through your threadbare cloak." Professor Boke is so superficial a philosopher that he does not perceive that while the principles on which men reason in morals are always the same the conclusions which they draw are very different. It has never occurred to him that there must have been some reason for the conflicting schools of philosophy that raged in controversy from the days of Protagoras to the days of Hobbes, and from the days of Hobbes to the days of Benjamin Ide Wheeler. He has come from Berkeley to preach morality to the people of San Francisco, and dogmatically he informs us that unless our perception of the truth be identical with his the presumption must be that we are crooks. There are two ways of being deceived—by false judgment and self-blindness. Boke has embraced both. Boke is a man of infallible perceptions. He knows when the Supreme Court is wrong and he knows the answer to the question which jesting Pilate put to Christ just before taking his departure.

The Paramount Issue

Professor Boke is unquestionably an honest man, and doubtless he is sincere in his belief in himself as a gnostic as well as in his position on the graft prosecution. But his attitude in this matter is precisely the same as the attitude of narrow-minded bigots in all ages of the world. It is inspired with the spirit that ordered heretics to be burnt at the stake. A heretic is nothing more than a man with an opinion which differs from yours. The man who doesn't agree with Boke is, in Boke's opinion, a heretic, but instead of ordering him to be burnt at the stake Boke points the finger of scorn at him and asks the community to consume him with contempt. Boke takes it for granted that he has overwhelmed the dissenters with an unanswerable argument. "San Francisco," he says, "must see but one course and refuse to turn from the one issue." As Boke sees but one issue he thinks it dishonest for anybody to see two. He knows, as we all know, that there has been graft in our city government, and he maintains that the only issue is between the grafters and the people. Of course there is another issue and a very important one. Boke, without realizing it, is for justice in the same sense in which the French revolutionists were for religion when they exalted a harlot upon an altar. Like Atticus, that pliant slave of every tyrant who could kiss the hand of Antony imbrued as it was in the blood of Caesar, Boke clasps to his breast the men who set Gallagher free, who brought scandal upon the courts, who debauched judicial officers and made a farce of the administration of justioce. In Boke's opinion it is a vicious heresy to hold that the punishment of grafters is of far less importance than the repudiation of men who have corrupted the courts and who are committing new iniquities to make effective their crimes against decency and justice. He cannot see that it is better for the administration of justice to be in clean hands than for a grafter to be sent to jail; more essential to civic well-being for public opinion to resent the prostitution of justice than to insist on the punishment of a bribe-giver. Boke is somewhat confused in his ideals.

The Ruef Case

Professor Boke, it is fair to assume, is not insensible of the iniquities of the Graft Prosecution. He advises us not to permit our prejudices against the Prosecution to blind us to the issue. He does not say that our prejudices are unreasonable. Boke himself is blind to the fact that the issue is in the hands of the men who brought scandal on the administration of justice; that these men are still intent on getting convictions by hook or crook; still hoping that the Court of Appeal and Supreme Court may be intimidated into approving their criminal methods. He points to the Ruef case and justly asserts that any reasonable man must acknowledge that there is evidence of Ruef's guilt. Why, we all know that Ruef is guilty. But most of us are of the opinion that he was promised immunity. We regard the promise made to Ruef as one of the crimes committed by the Prosecution, and we regard the breaking of that promise as the most infamous of all the crimes charged against the Prosecution. Our conception of the hideousness of those crimes springs from the conviction that all the complications in which Ruef has figured were the result of a design to procure perjured testimony. Ruef says that if permitted to cross-examine the judges who sanctioned the immunity contract he can prove that he is the victim of treachery. The judges have evaded the ordeal and one of them has decided that he can give Ruef an impartial trial. Boke approves all this. Boke wants justice vindicated, and he is willing to have it vindicated by the men who have polluted the temple of justice.

In Retrospective Vein

Who's this that preacheth on old Crothers' page,
Exhorting us once more to fret and rage?
Why Boke it is, that endless, babbling bore,
Exuding virtue from his every pore.
This fatuous dupe of a curious mind,
Clamors for justice while to justice blind.
Prophet of evil he sees naught but ill
In every cause that Spreckels cannot kill.
Adjuring us to save the city's name,
On none but boodlers does he cast his blame.
Bred to the bar, and for its toils decreed,
He's versed in law, and for the courts would bleed;
Declares for justice he will always stand—
The kind that he and Heney can command.
To please him we must agitate and strive
Once more the reign of terror to revive;
Encourage rogues who oft have boasted zeal
For God and men and for the city's weal;
And who with Malice, Hatred, Spleen conspired,
The rabble roused and all their passions fired;
Self-styled defenders of the people's cause,
Who prostituted the most sacred laws.
Provoking public rage for private ends,
They slandered courts and made of grafters friends;
With purchased pens they spread foul lies abroad,
And boldly sought to purify by fraud.
Ah, those were times when Heaven grieved to see,
A Ruef embraced and Gallagher set free;
A pliant jurist holding court at night
To darken deed he dared not flood with light;
One who on perjured witness cast no frown,
Nor entered protest as the lie went down.
Thus justice sat absolving fatal crimes,
To purify men's morals and the times.
In vain did honest citizens condemn
The shrieking infamies they could not stem.
'Twas thus when rancor and revenge were sent
A tortured, shattered city to torment.
Ye gods! what havoc here did men create—
The servile instruments of savage hate!
What crimes were here committed and condoned
When Spreckels ruled and Justice was dethroned!
When subtle pretense by appearance charmed,
And sober sense was thoroughly disarmed!
When deftly masks were worn to screen
The ruthless purposes of festering spleen!
Who but a Boke can on these things reflect,
And recommend the doers to respect?
Who but a Berkeley Shadwell make pretense,
That deviates so far from common sense?
Quite logical that Boke should come with zeal
To open wounds we long have hoped to heal.
All conscious he of noble worth and aims,
With civic virtue all his being flames.
But quite unmoved the mob observes his pose,
And as he talks the people softly doze.

When the Father Departs

Evil days are drawing nigh. Times that shall try men's souls are close at hand. The nation will soon feel the uplift of a hand that has lain heavy upon it lo, these many years; not so many either when we come to think that the strenuous white father at Washington has only served two terms—or is it but a term and a half? However, when Roosevelt is no more, and when Taft is in the sad-

SILK DEPARTMENT

Our handsome new store is rapidly approaching completion. The days of our Removal Sale are numbered and the daily list of special sales is especially inviting.

Important Removal Announcement—Values to $1.50 Yard, 50c Yard

A great culmination of values and styles all to be closed out at 50c yard. You realize very keenly what it means to buy silk worth up to $1.50 yard for 50c. While there are possibly 5000 yards in this lot, the selling will be brisk. The styles comprise a varied assortment of this season's novelties in checks, plaids and stripes in medium and dark colors.

Included in the above lot is 350 yards of 27-inch Surahs with white grounds and dainty colored flower patterns especially pretty for house dresses. You are sure to find just what you want in this lot.

dle, things will surely go askew for lack of a firm hand to set them right. Taft is not the man to succeed Roosevelt —presuming for the sake of this essay in the comparative anatomy of statesmen, that William Jennings Bryan is not destined to be the successor. Taft is, by nature, an easy going, affable, suave, amiable, courteous, civil, urbane, neighborly, conciliatory, obliging, mild-mannered gentleman. There is nothing fatherly about Taft, nothing dictatorial, nothing austere, nothing offensive or defensive. Taft has never expressed the slightest apprehension that the race would commit suicide; he has never accused anyone of faking nature; he calls no man liar or mollycoddle; the glad grasp of his fat hand is for all men; his smile is all pervading; his merry widower sombrero is all shadowing; his girth of paunch is all embracing of the good things he eats and drinks. Taft is not a statesman in the sense that his omniscient predecessor is a statesman—he is only a good fellow, a happy-go-lucky lawyer whose adaptability has made him the legatee of a lot of "policies" that he will never be able to underwrite or redeem. Like the phonograph he reproduces; and like the little dog in front of the horn he knows his master's voice. But when he is President of this great nation other voices will dictate from the new discs enunciating later "policies" formulated by masters quite different from the one that is now making a record for the gramaphone of history. It has been said that Taft is "a man's man"; as President he would be a man of many men, a redundant echo of many voices, an epitome of many "policies." Under the rule of Taft we shall be like children out of school and away from the stern authority of a relentless teacher whose ruthless laws were enforced by terror of the castigatory birch. Anarchy, hilarious and joyful anarchy, is sure to ensue upon the inauguration of Taft. I fear that we have committeed a very grave error in not making the stern father of the nation dictator in perpetuity. I see much calamity ahead whatever may be the result of the people's verdict in November—whether Taft jollies us from his proud perch under the great white dome or whether Bryan worries us from his cage in the capital. I fear that we shall long regret the day that we let King Stork go and accepted King Gog or King Demagogue.

Says American Girls are Greedy

Miss May Sutton has frequently said that the Englishwoman averages better tennis than the American. Miss Sutton knows enough about the game to win the world's championship so it would be difficult to discredit her. Why should the American girl, collectively, play a lower grade tennis than the English composite? The triumphant Rah, Rah, Rah's of the Americans at the Olympic games gave the English a pain in their tympanums. But when it comes to tennis Miss Sutton does not average the American girl in the same rank as her English sister and all because she is "too greedy!" By "greedy," Miss Sutton does not mean that the American variety is the more intemperate in the matter of roast beef and Yorkshire pudding. Miss Sutton believes that the American girl is too greedy for pleasure to put up as good a game of tennis as the average English girl. An American girl, who is going to play a match game at some pleasure resort, cannot forego the gayeties arranged in honor of the event. She will dance as long as the music keeps up, eat a midnight supper and then try to win out a tennis match on just a sample of sleep. The English girls are not so greedy for their pleasures, says Miss Sutton. They forego the most enticing gayeties to keep in good form for the game. They make pleasure a business and it is not good business to try to play tennis, all fagged out from social enterprises.

Miss Sutton's Pet Idea

A study of Miss Sutton's methods during the present tournament at Del Monte would convince any American girl that to play top-notch tennis one must exercise a good deal of restraint in the line of pleasure. The Sutton girls all keep in "good form." They are English enough to make pleasure a business and never let anything interfere with their sleep or diet when a game is on. May Sutton, particularly keeps in training as zealously as any professional athlete.

When they've perfected the aerial cars,
And take flying trips up to Mars,
We ask in amaze
What will then be the craze?

Saving a Bumper Fruit Crop

The California Fruit companies have been so hampered by lack of hands to gather the heavy fruit crop in some of the counties of Northern California that they have petitioned several school boards to extend the summer vacation in order that the pupils may help out in the work. The situation is almost unprecedented though seven years ago several of the districts were caught in a somewhat similar fix and solved the problem in the same way. In Chico the school boards have given the delighted children an extended two weeks' vacation so that they may help their parents and the packers to gather the heavy crop. The gates are not only open to the primary and grammar school children but to the pupils in the High and Normal schools so that it is evident that the need of extra hands is extremely pressing. The northern fruit crop is a bumper in many lines this year and its proper harvesting means many millions of dollars to the State.

Her Experience in Psychic Phenomena

Carrie Roma, well known here in the famous days of the Tivoli, has been studying psychic phenomena of late, so she says. Carrie is her own best press-agent and she writes as though she had once been a queen of opera, singing in the leading opera houses of the world. She writes: "I had just finished an arduous three-year operatic contract in Europe, and being very tired and in need of rest, I took some professional friends and went to the south of France on a vacation. All through May I had a feeling that something was wrong at home in California and, as my mother had not been well for several years, I was quite depressed. I'd awaken at night to find myself crying. To divert my mind I decided to write some new songs. Never having written any religious songs up to that time, just as a novelty, I set 'Nearer, My God, to Thee' and 'Abide With Me' to music. One night we were all in the drawing room, overlooking the sea, and I was playing over the new songs for my guests. Suddenly I heard Mme. Augarde say: 'Regardez, c'est la mort, Roma!' ('Look, it is death, Roma!') A big white, beautiful moth, with black markings on its head resembling a skull and crossbones, had flown into the room, alighting directly on the piano at which I was sitting. 'Someone belonging to one of us had just died,' she continued, and all of us being professionals, and more or less superstitious, felt that some misfortune had occurred.

Awaiting an Explanation

"During the next few days, still feeling that dreadful 'something' I could not explain, I wrote 'Resignation' somehow. In the beautiful sentiment of the lyrics I seemed to feel a bit of comfort, and eventually the blue spell passed away. This was in July, and in returning home to London to unpack the costume trunks for our opening on 'Lucia' night, my manager said, 'Roma, here's a letter from your people which I did not send to you, knowing you'd have so short a vacation and wouldn't want to be bothered answering letters.' On opening the letter there was a clipping announcing the death of my mother in California. Comparing the dates with my own diary I found that when she lay semi-conscious calling for me, I was crying unconsciously in my sleep; the day she died I was writing 'Nearer, My God, to Thee,' and the day she was buried I was writing a new version of 'Abide with Me,' the very hymn that was being sung at her burial service. On the day when they were burying her cremated ashes I, unconscious of that event, was writing 'Resignation.' Who can explain these things?"

Tetrazzini's Success in London

Tetrazzini's success in London this season demonstrated that the public there prefers the singers to the operas. Certain it is that Tetrazzini reintroduced to London several operas which have not been included in the list of productions for the last few years, because the British public did not want them and would not go to hear them. Yet these operas were her special successes, and in them she drew crowded houses to the very end of the season. Then came the return of Melba, who for many years has been the idol of the British public. Every one waited to see what would happen. Would Melba find her place usurped and the public following another star? Not at all. What happened was just this. The British public divided its affections carefully between its favorites. If the line waited at the balcony doors on a Tetrazzini opera night from nine in the morning till half past seven in the evening, it did the same for Melba, and both were greeted with the same outbursts of applause. Even the press never indulged in comparisons, and if the newspapers extolled Tetrazzini in one paragraph, in the next they said that never had Melba been in better voice since the days when she first gladdened Covent Garden twenty years and more ago. Mlle. Destine was another triumphant member of the opera company, and there are many critics who name her as the greatest artist that the season gave London. It was for her that "Aida" was given so often, as London revelled in her wonderful impersonation of the Egyptian slave. Of the tenors Bonci led as a favorite, though Giovanni Zenatello was a close second. The number of English and American singers was greater

The Love Tale of a Handsome Tenor

Since Caruso's wife deserted him the stories of their domestic relationship have been coming to hand piecemeal till they form the following very romantic tale: the woman whose shortcomings Caruso affects to deplore is not his wife, but a beautiful singer who, years ago, under the handsome young tenor's blandishments, left her husband. Caruso, it is said, bought for her a beautiful villa near Florence, and life there was a summer song. Then came the discords. A year ago the husband threatened court reprisals. Caruso and his inamorata at once planned to take out American citizenship in New York in order to enable the latter to get a decree of divorce and marry the tenor. Again Fate forced them to change their plans and she left for London. When the last opera season was finished in New York Caruso followed her to London. While awaiting him, however, she had fallen in love with the chauffeur. Still when Caruso appeared on the scene she quietly joined him as if no other love had intervened.

Surprising Denouement

At that time the famous tenor was negotiating for the purchase of a magnificent residence near Nice. His engagements to sing at private concerts, however, detained him longer than had been expected, so that the impatient lady of reckless hearts had her whim granted and was sent on alone to her original Florentine villa. The chauffeur was there and very shortly afterwards, and before Caruso got wind of what was going on, she fled with him to Nice, taking with her, it is said, jewels valued at $160,000. Caruso at once started in pursuit. The tenor recovered his two sons, but that was all; the woman remained with the chauffeur. The latest story from Nice contains a rather startling denouement. It is to the effect that the chauffeur is no other than the woman's husband in disguise; that he sought employment in order to obtain the opportunities to influence his wife to return to him and that she became so captivated with his ingenious trick in love's recovery that she not only kept his secret, but finally yielded to his pleadings.

Luxurious New Hotel for San Francisco

The new and luxurious Granada Hotel will be thrown open to the public in a few days. It rises on the site of the old establishment more magnificent than ever, an incomparable ornament to the hotel life of San Francisco. No pains or expense have been spared to make it an ideal hostelry: its construction, equipment, furnishings, conveniences and service are unsurpassed. The building is absolutely fireproof throughout, with steel frame and reinforced concrete. Everyone of the 232 rooms is an outside room and just one-half of these are equipped with baths. The hotel will be under the management of E. S. de Wolfe, former proprietor of the Hotel Pleasanton, and it goes without saying that he will eclipse the splendid reputation he made in that select establishment. It will be conducted on the American plan with special attention to making the cuisine the best on the Coast. The finest furnishings, tableware and ornaments are now being installed, all in harmonious keeping with the beautiful hardwoods and the marbles with which the interior is finished.

THE WEEK'S FINANCIAL OUTLOOK

By R. E. Mulcahy

More new high stock price records are in evidence, Southern Pacific 108¼. The Harriman stocks occupy the center of the stage. The volume of trading in Southern Pacific and Union Pacific shares has furnished the Stock Exchange with one-third of its entire business. It is quite a marked change to general conditions to have Southern Pacific Common a market leader, which it has been for the past two weeks, with Union Pacific taking second place and the rest of the market dragging along in its wake. Wall Street is much at sea regarding the unusual strength shown in Southern Pacific. The advance in Union Pacific can be easily accounted for; the advance in Harriman securities since last December amounts to over one hundred million dollars; the greater part of this fabulous amount may be accredited to Union Pacific. It is quite evident a distribution plan of some kind is not far distant. It is claimed on good authority that the Union Pacific Company's income from investment holdings will pay all fixed charges and also 7 per cent on the common stock; this being the case the road has only to earn 3 per cent to pay its present dividend of 10 per cent; the surplus over and above 3 per cent will provide a grand surplus fund which sooner or later must reach stockholders. The surplus funds of railways are not idle by any means; these funds are employed in the call money market affording a handsome return for their use. It is said the Harriman properties loan more money on call than any system of railways in this country. Everything considered the Union Pacific basket is a most fortunate one. Well informed sources predict 125 for Southern Pacific Common and 200 for Union Pacific Common before January 1st. Atchison Common and preferred have been given more than usual interest of late. 91 for the common is not high for a 5 per cent stock. The reduction of its dividend from 6 per cent to 5 per cent a short time ago seems to have been a wise move. The property requires considerable expenditure in the way of betterments, which are now receiving every attention. The physical condition of the Atchison is being greatly improved; this means a reduction in operating expenses, which will later be transferred to an increased dividend and in the end will prove beneficial to stockholders. The Hill stocks appear dormant. Very little is heard of Hill or Morgan of late. It may be possible that these giants of the financial world understand each other better than the public have surmised. It would not be surprising that later on when Harriman advances his securities to prices where he is satisfied, a general bull movement will take place in the Morgan-Hill groups. In this way bankers would not be crowded for funds and the advance would require no large amount to finance. The public are not helping the upward trend of values to any great extent. While they are trading rather freely they grab quick profits and are keeping close to shore feeling that a good reaction must come before election. The fact that everybody is looking for a reaction is a pretty fair sign that it will not come. The last depression came fully one year before it was looked for, and the present advance gives every indication of continuing for a long time to come; small reactions will be seen, but it is very doubtful if more than a five point recession will be seen.

The only crop at present causing any apprehension is corn. Reports from officials of the Wabash Railway say the crop will not be over two-thirds of that of last year along their lines. The high price prevailing for corn would give color to a short crop prospect. Wheat, oats, and many other crops are harvested and are bountiful notwithstanding cereal prices promise to be high this crop year. Foreign countries are: United Kingdom—Rains have fallen during the week which has interrupted the harvesting of wheat. France—The weather is very favorable for harvesting and merchants are more hopeful. Owing to the favorable weather attending harvest there is a tendency to raise estimates regarding the yield. Germany—The weather continues favorable and prospects for a good crop are maintained. Offerings of new wheat are increasing. Hungary—There are liberal offerings of new wheat which are being well absorbed. Roumania—The weather continues favorable. Russia—In the southwest there are very poor prospects of furnishing any wheat for export while in the southeast the outlook for export is more hopeful but still uncertain. In the Caucasus district the outlook for the crop is rather poor, barley fair, corn and oats good. Spain—There are some complaints being heard regarding a short crop.

Have Exchanged Peace Tokens

Mr. Simpkins and Mr. Scott, whose fistic eloquence at a Burlingame club dinner has been banged about in the press, celebrated their love feast in a jewelry shop, where each purchased for the other a handsome token of an affection that could not be shivered into bits by a lumbering old chair or the flash of a knife. That their friendship did not run amuck is not so surprising to those who know the position Harry Simpkins occupies in the home of Henry T. Scott. He is like an elder brother to the Scott boys, and brotherly love can stand indignities that less fraternal affection would resent. Through his intimacy with the Scotts and the Walter Martins he has often been elected as an escort for Miss Jennie Crocker and those who compute matrimonial chances by straws have wondered whether Mr. Simpkins was a suitor in disguise. But I am told that Miss Crocker also regards him as a brother of the family, and so, occasionally, shows him special favor—as when she invited him to be a member of the little party that she took to Mexico last year in her private car.

Scharz, Photo, Oakland. MISS ALICE SMYTHE.

Miss Smythe is the youngest daughter of Mrs. M. E. Smythe of San Lorenzo. She will be married to Mr. Edwin Smith in her mother's beautiful home September 9th.

Injured Cupid's Chances

However, in spite of the billing and cooing of the facetious combatants there appears to be a serious side to the affair. It is whispered that young Scott had been paying attention to a charming young woman, who is a particular protege of his mother's. All the family were keeping their fingers crossed for luck, for it has happened in the past that Harry's flights of fancy have not always been steered according to maternal ideas of dirigible balloons with Cupid at the engine. But this time everything was rippling along as smooth as a summer sky, when Harry was impelled to pull a chair out from under Simpkins, polish up the floor with him in an effort to earn the title of "the great beeg Sylvestre," and incidentally shock the young lady who is something of a stickler for the proprieties. It would appear that somebody besides Simpkins went keplunk! in that notorious chair pulling match!

New Plans of the de Youngs

Miss Helen de Young has joined the Wellington Gregg party and with her fiance, Mr. George Cameron, and the Greggs, is making an automobile tour of the chateau country. The latest letters from Miss de Young refute the possibility of a marriage abroad and present plans focus on a big house wedding in November. The wedding gowns of both Helen and Constance de Young have already been delivered by the Paris house to whom the order was given.

Break in the Family

Mrs. Phoebe Hearst has been entertaining a houseful of children this summer, with the list headed by her two grandchildren, her grand nieces and nephews and the children of several friends. She is very fond of children and loves to play the piano for their after-dinner frolic, though she does not profess to be a musician. Mrs. Leonard (Agnes Lane) and her handsome little son, who have been with "Aunt Phoebe" all summer, have taken apartments at the St. Xavier for the winter. Mrs. Hearst bitterly opposed the marriage of her niece to the dashing young New Yorker, and unfortunately the marriage fulfilled her uneasy expectations. While there has not been a divorce the separation is said to be final and the sympathies of the husband's family are all with the charming young wife.

Fragment of conversation overheard in the lobby of Del Monte last Saturday evening:

Mr. Willis Polk—"I don't have to be polite to you, do I, Mrs. Alexander?"

Mrs. Charles B. Alexander—"Oh, no, Mr. Polk, just be natural."

Trying to Patch Up Peace

A persistent rumor has been scurrying through the highways and byways and dodging under the legs of sociable tea tables to the effect that the papers in the Gaston Ashe divorce case may be withdrawn and a reconciliation follow. But the various members of the Ashe clan assert that there is absolutely no foundation in this rumor, as a legal separation is inevitable. Miss Elizabeth Ashe, who is the head of the Telegraph Hill neighborhood club, and in her settlement work has often been called upon to patch up peace in a family jarred by something besides Gray Bros. blasting, used her specialized knowledge in her brother's family, but it was the old story of the prophet abroad. No amount of family persuasion and interference has availed.

is rooted on this large Spanish grant. During the lifetime of Madame Bolado it was a gathering place for all the distinguished people who came to California. Mrs. Gaston Ashe's mother was one of the remarkable women who earned a reputation for the girl of the Golden West. She was beautiful in a petite, delicate way and possessed besides a charm of mind that even in her invalid days toward the close of her life drew to her men and women of broad culture. She came as near to being the inspiration of a salon as any woman in California, all the distinguished foreigners seeking out her drawing room. She was married to Senor Bolado at the precocious age of sixteen or thereabouts, and I have often heard a Frenchman who managed the largest dry goods store in the city at the time, tell how when her trousseau was purchased he imagined that it was simply an outfit for a girl who was to be sent abroad to school. Her tiny stature made her seem even younger than she was, and as it was a very handsome order, when the trousseau was sent home to the rancho the manager enclosed with his compliments the handsomest French doll in the place!

New Rumors of Orville Pratt's Wanderings

The marriage of Miss Emily Wilson and Orville Pratt has not yet ceased to rattle the teacups. A girl who has just returned from the East insists that Mr. Pratt is not in Europe with his bride but is cooling his peripatetic heels on the Atlantic seaboard awaiting the arrival of his bride, who is in Europe with her mother. Mr. Pratt's whereabouts has kept public interest two-stepping ever since the papers tripped upon the ends of the knot so quietly and securely tied in Martinez. It was reported that he had gone East with his wife and mother-in-law on the heels of a confession of marriage and this was believed until Town Talk informed its readers that instead he was stalking the wooded slopes of Kings River Canyon with the Sierra Club. When the young man learned that his secret had had the lid wrenched off he started East, apparently determined to catch up with his bride before the honeymoon had passed the first quarter.

Early Return of the Pratts

The bavardes of the press have polished their prettiest adjectives to trim the account of the lively time this bride and groom are having motoring on the continent. And now comes a young lady who could identify pictures of Orville Pratt showing him from his choo-choo days to the hour he eloped with Miss Wilson, and she declares that she distinctly saw Mr. Pratt in New York after the date he was said to have sailed for Europe. Moreover she insists that he is still in the East, though her friends have not yet discovered her authority for such belief. It is definitely announced by the family that the young couple will return to San Francisco at the end of this month and then their curious friends will have an opportunity to prick them with interrogation and exclamation points. While it is entirely probable that Mr. Pratt was seen in New York after the sailing date credited to him, it sounds highly incredible that the young couple are still on opposite sides of the pond. The only plausible explanation would be that the young man was afraid of being scorched with a mother-in-law's righteous indignation, but even that theory looks thin and vapory to those who know Mrs. Russell Wilson and her disposition, which has a preservaline in it that keeps it sweet in any climate and under any conditions.

Aftermath of a Game of Bridge Whist

Every now and then a near-scandal peeps out from behind our fashionable bridge tables, but as yet very little explosive material has been found by the reformers compared to the highly inflammable information given out every now and then by some disgruntled player at a New York bridge fest. However, just now there is a story going the local rounds which shows the stakes played for at after-luncheon bridge are sometimes dangerously out of joint with the income of the loser. The husband of the unlucky player is spreading the story in his wrath at the high stakes indulged in by women and there are very few corners in society where the story has not trickled. The wife confessed to her husband that at a little bridge game after luncheon she lost $150 to the hostess. The hostess, in spite of this unearned increment, stood a loser in the final reckoning and she asked her debtor to pay her the $150 at once so that she could liquidate her own debts. Not having the money the guest had to confess to her husband, who sent a check to the hostess for $152.50. A query from the hostess regarding the extra $2.50 brought the reply from the caustic gentleman that the $2.50 was to pay for his wife's luncheon, and he hoped the business she was conducting would continue to thrive!

Marked by Simplicity and Sentiment

The wedding of Miss Madeline Bohrmann and Henry Clay Miller in St. John's Church, Rose Valley, last Saturday, was maked by quiet simplicity and beauty. An ideal summer day gave a picture to the surroundings which the many friends present will long cherish. Tender sentiment and kindly consideration touched everything connected with the wedding. After the ceremony the radiant bride, seated in her carriage beside the church door, shook hands and spoke with all the guests as they passed out. Among the many delightful and delighted ornaments of the charming occasion was little Miss Enid Foster, quite suffused in happiness as she drove back and forth in her little cart, the dignified pony a mass of fluttering white satin ribbon, while the pretty frocked little guests in the seats chattered the joy of the day with their beaming diminutive hostess.

Surprised the Groom

The decorations of the beautiful C. J. Foster home for the reception were delicately artistic. Yellow was the predominating note in the spacious living room where the bride and groom received their guests. The two dining rooms were in pink, the bride's table being in maiden hair, white tulle and manila lilies. Mr. A. A. Watkins proved a very genial toastmaster and kept the merriment spinning. Felicitous toasts were responded to by Mr. Frank Johnson, Mr. L. Beedy, Mr. Esberg and others. A pretty and very timely gift was presented by Rev. Mr. Carroll to the bride, in the shape of a handsome book in which all the guests inscribed their names. Miss Edna Davis was favored by fortune and caught the bride's bouquet amidst the laughter of the merry throng. More than the usual amusement was created when the bride and groom were showered with rice and beans, wittily suggestive of Mr. Miller's extensive dealings in that staple.

The Little Ring Bearer Ready

The arrangements are completed for the wedding of Miss Irene Van Arnsdale and Lieutenant Kurtz, U. S. N. The ceremony will take place September 16th at the residence of the bride's parents in this city, and will be witnessed by the relatives and intimate friends only. The maid of honor will be Miss Hazel Rix, who will wear a handsome empire gown of white chiffon. Miss Florence Booth and Miss Helen Sullivan, the bridesmaids, will be dressed in rare creations of delicate pink chiffon. A brother officer will attend the groom. The trousseau of the bride is said to be of extreme elegance. Mr. Van Arnsdale is the lumber king of Mendocino county; Miss Van Arnsdale is an only child. Lieutenant Kurtz is at present stationed at Yuerba Buena Island.

Invitations Out for the Wedding

Mr. Nathaniel Jones Brittan has issued invitations for the wedding of his daughter, Miss Natalie Theodora, to Ernest Williams Hewson. The ceremony will be performed on September 12th at nine o'clock, in the Peninsular Hotel, San Mateo. The couple will leave for China to be gone one year or more. Miss Brittan is the twin sister of Miss Belle Brittan, and sister of Mrs. Kendall, formerly Carmelita Brittan, whose marriage took place last year. The late Mrs. Bullock, of Redwood City, was the mother of these interesting girls. Mrs. Bullock was Miss Isabel Fallon, the beautiful daughter of the late Thomas Fallon of San Jose. She was married to the father of these charming girls when in her early teens. The match proved unhappy; there was a divorce and subsequently she married the district attorney of Redwood City, a marriage which proved ideal. Mrs. Bullock lived less than a year after her second marriage.

New Feature for the Wedding

The wedding of Miss Alice Smythe, the youngest daughter of Mrs. M. E. Smythe, of San Lorenzo, and Edwin Smith, of Oakland, will take place at the beautiful old home of the bride's mother in San Lorenzo, September 9th. It will be a large and elaborate affair. A feature of the wedding will be the leading of the bridal procession by the members of a sewing club to which Miss Smythe belongs. The following named ladies will join the procession and will sing the wedding song from "Lohengrin": Mrs. H. J. Lackey, Mrs. Harry Anderson, Miss Eda Curtts, Miss Abba Sanborn, Mrs. John L. Reed, Mrs. Gillespie, Mrs. William MacDonald, Mrs. Beach Dean, Miss Katherine Gray and Miss Agnes Thompson. The beautiful gowns of these ten lovely singers are of light blue rainbow shades. Miss Elsie Smythe will attend her sister as maid of honor. A little nephew, Harry Smythe, Jr., will be the ring bearer. The groom is a member of the firm of Leet & Co., of Oakland. Dr. F. H. Frenzel, of Berkeley, will attend the groom as best man. Rev. Alexander Allen of St. Paul's Church, Oakland, will perform the ceremony. Upon the return of the bride and groom they will reside on Grand avenue, Oakland, in the beautiful home the groom has just built.

Ready for the Big Tennis Tournament

The benches about the fine bitumen tennis courts of the Hotel Del Monte will be crowded with sightseers this coming two weeks. For there the match play for the tennis championship of the Pacific Coast will be held. Maurice McLaughlin, who now holds the title, will be called upon to defend the same from the winner of the men's singles. In like manner Miss Florence Sutton, the present woman champion of the Pacific Coast, must meet those who win in the women's singles. Mr. McLaughlin and George Jones will play the winners of the men's doubles for the title they now hold, as will Mrs. B. O. Bruce and Miss Florence Sutton, who won the women's doubles against all comers in 1907. Robert Strachan, the boy wonder who made such an excellent showing at Santa Barbara earlier in the season, will also be ready to meet all comers in his junior class. Against these present champions will come some of the best players in the country. May Sutton, the former champion, has decided to attempt to wrest the honors from her sister. Nathan W. Niles, the tennis champion of Harvard; Wallace F. Johnson, interscholastic champion of the Eastern States; Irving C. Wright, brother of Beals Wright, the present world's champion, will all be there. As all of these and the local players are so well known an exciting contest is promised. The trophies are more numerous and attractive than have hitherto been offered. From present indications this will be the biggest and best tennis meeting that has been held this season.

TROPHIES OFFERED IN THE TWENTY-FIRST ANNUAL CHAMPIONSHIP TOURNAMENT OF THE PACIFIC STATES LAWN TENNIS ASSOCIATION AT DEL MONTE, SEPTEMBER 7TH TO 19TH.

Enjoying Monterey Bay

My Pacific Grove correspondent writes that among interesting people who have been spending the summer here are, Professor P. E. Davidson of Stanford University and his sisters, Miss Davidson and Mrs. E. A. Weiley of Los Angeles. Professor Loeb of Berkeley and Professor Kuntz of Berlin are registered at the Hotel. Professor Kuntz is a former instructor of Professor Loeb. Mr. and Mrs. Edward McLellan of Mill Valley are enjoying a week's stay in Pacific Grove. Mr. and Mrs. S. F. B. Morse of New York have taken a cottage in the Grove pending the building of a home in the San Joaquin Valley. Mr. Morse has charge of John Hays Hammond's interests in Visalia and expects to spend several years on the Coast. Mrs. Morse is a great friend of Miss Jennie Crocker and spends much of her time with her at Del Monte. J. L. Gillis, State Librarian, Mrs. Gillis and the Misses Gillis have been spending the summer at the Hotel. Others here are, Mr. and Mrs. H. S. Crane, who motored from Turlock during the week; Mrs. C. T. Hastings and Miss Hastings of San Francisco; Mrs. C. B. Shaver and Miss Shaver of Fresno, who are here for an indefinite stay and have with them Miss Clark of Portland; Mr. and Mrs. A. W. Byers of Kansas City and Mr. and Mrs R. V. Hall of Hanford.

Quietly Married

Mrs. Emily Eaton was quietly married to Dr. Harry S. Moore, this week. Mrs. Eaton was the widow of Lloyd Eaton, who died several years ago in Nome, Alaska, leaving a daughter now about ten years old. Dr. Moore is the last of a group of well known bachelors of a few years ago who kept attractive social quarters in Pacific Street.

Camping in the Back Yard

The Will Tevises, the Mountford Wilsons, the Henry T. Scotts, and other jolly families of out-door lovers in their set, are having a lively summer time on the picturesque shores of Lake Tahoe. The walls of the Will Tevis cottage are fairly bulging with the house guests he has managed to cram within its doors. The Mountford Wilsons are enthusiastic campers but they insist on getting all the fresh air that is coming to them on a summer outing, so they pre-empted quarters in the Tevis back-yard and raised their own tents, Arab like, in the free Sierra breezes. The Henry T. Scotts are bunking with them as their guests. Henry T. Scott acquired the bunking habit when he was building men-of-war for Uncle Sam, but he is only exercising it now on summer holidays, or when he is trying to bunko Mountford Wilson out of doing his share of the camp work. Aside from the growls of the three blooded watch dogs there is little kicking going on in the camp, considering Mountford Wilson is bossing it and Will Tevis is exercising his proprietary rights over his own back yard. Peace perches there beside the slumbering watch dogs for the jolly and artful campers spend the most of their time on inviting mountain walks or visiting friends in more convenient camps where the cuisine seems to work easier.

Out Door Sports at Del Monte

From Monterey I learn that the outdoor show of the Del Monte Kennel Club had two days marked by ideal mid-summer weather. Friday and Saturday of last week brought blue skies and gentle breezes and the spectators, in their dainty lingerie frocks and bright hued parasols made a very pretty picture as they sat under the green trees around the judges platforms while the dogs of every variety of hair were made to trot around at their very best. Mrs. Charles B. Alexander was an interested onlooker, especially while her niece, Miss Jennie Crocker led out her famous Boston terriers which she did as she does everything elsewithout a trace of self-consciousness. Mrs. Alexander wore a handsome white lace gown with a picture hat and looked the typical New York woman. Mrs. William H. Crocker was also among the spectators becomingly attired in black and white. The youngest Crocker girl is going to be a beauty if she fulfills the promise of her childhood. She is eleven, a decided brunette with the lustrous black eyes and brilliant coloring that distinguished her mother when she was young. Mrs. Nat T. Messer was the object of many admiring eyes as she watched the judging from an elevated position. She wore white with a very fetching Charlotte Corday hat shading her pretty brown eyes. She had with her Miss Marjorie Shepard, one of the most attractive of next winter's debutantes and for whom much popularity is prophesied, and Miss Elsa Draper, both of whose canine pets were cup winners. Miss Gertrude Jolliffe in all white and a huge hat and Mrs. Charles B. Wingate, Mrs. Orestes Pierce and Mrs. Wickham Havens were also among the interested spectators. Now that the dog show is a thing of the past, everyone's interest is centered in the golf tournament, in which many of the best players of the State will compete. There are dozens of stunningly handsome cups and trophies on exhibition at the hotel for the handicap match play, for the runners-up, mixed foursomes and the consolation handicaps for both men and women. Among those who have arrived at the Hotel for the golf tournament are, Mr. and Mrs. J. V. Elliott, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas P. Mumford ,Mr. and Mrs. E. H. Stafford, Colin Stewart, S. G Dunham of Pasadena, R. Y. Hayne of San Mateo, Mr. and Mrs. Alexander S. Lilley of Cincinnati, P. W. Seeley and Miss Jane Seeley of Menlo Park, J. A. Lindsay of Victoria, B. C., Miss Chesebrough, H. B. Wrenn of Chicago, and Rev. David M. Crabtree, who has come up from Southern California to take part in the play. Mr. Crabtree is very liberal in his views. He is not adverse to smoking nor does he disapprove of bridge as was attested last week when he substituted for his wife at a ladies card party given in Pacific Grove. Although he was the only gentleman present he seemed to enjoy the experience.

In the Social Spotlight

Miss Gussie Foute is the guest of Mrs. Horace Blanchard Chase at Stag's Leap for the next ten days. During her stay Mrs. Chase will entertain several young gentlemen, among them Mr. Gring and Mr. Clifford.

Invitations have been issued for the wedding of Dollie Bainbridge Tarpey and J. Pauling Edwards at the Fairmont Hotel on the evening of Wednesday, September 9th, at 9 o'clock.

Mrs. E. Walton Hedges gave a dinner Friday evening in honor of Miss Ellen Page and Dr. J. Pressley, whose engagement has just been announced.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles B. Alexander and their daughters, Miss Harriet, Miss Janetta and Miss Mary, will leave next Tuesday morning for their New York home.

Mrs. Marguerite Hanford will be the hostess at a large dinner at the Fairmont next week in honor of Mrs. Linda Bryan and Mr. P. C. Hale.

Miss Lillie Lawlor left this week en route to London, where she will visit Miss Foulkes at her charming home, Abbey Lodge. Later she will go to Paris and return to her New York apartments in November.

Mr. and Mrs. W. Weir, who have been spending the summer at their beautiful country home in Fair Oaks, will return to town for the winter November 1st and reside at the residence of William F. Whittier, Sr.

Mrs. Camillo Martin, Miss Mamie Hyde and Mrs. A. Garceau will spend the winter in Egypt.

Miss Margaret Newhall has joined her mother at the Hotel Potter, Santa Barbara.

Miss Florence Dunham is at Inverness, the guest of Mrs. Simmons.

The art colony, which has long been waiting for the completion of Charles Rollo Peter's Nocturne, will have an opportunity to admire it this week. It is expected that by next Friday the canvas will be in the panel over the big fireplace in the St. Francis lobby. In such a position it will, in a measure, represent California art to foreign and eastern travellers, so local connoisseurs are taking an unusual amount of interest in its appearance.

Frank S. Hall and H. R. Putnam, of the Muraine Eye Remedy Company, Chicago, are spending the season visiting the prominent scenic places along the Pacific Coast. Last Friday they left for Del Monte to enjoy the notable "season of outdoor sports" under the famous Monterey oaks. From Del Monte the travelers will go to Los Angeles, where they will visit the most attractive of the southern resorts. This is Mr. Hall's third trip "seeing California," and he declares that each visit only fires his appetite to view more of the picturesque beauties of the State.

The Latin Quarter is again the scene of the old-time gayeties of care free bohemia. Many of the sculptors, artists and designers are foregathering at the old Latin Hall as in the blithesome days before the fire.

Madam Olga will hold her regular fall opening, September 4th, 5th and 6th, at 1703 California street, when she will display her latest and smartest millinery creations in exclusive models direct from Paris.

Mr. and Mrs. Walter Martin are at Shasta for the month of September.

Mrs. L. L. Baker has taken apartments at the Hillcrest for the winter.

Mr. and Mrs. Oscar Maurer are back in their Berkeley home after an extended trip through the picturesque corners of old Mexico.

Mrs. Blair and her daughter, Miss Jennie Blair, plan to spend the winter in town.

Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Martin will leave for a trip abroad early in October.

Mr. and Mrs. Pond and Miss McNeil have taken apartments at the Hillcrest for the winter.

Mr. and Mrs. Jack Hoffman of Oakland are visiting the Waterhouses in Bolinas.

Miss Lola Harris left for New York on Saturday last to join her sister, Mrs. Benjamin Lathrop. Later Miss Harris will go abroad for an indefinite stay.

Mrs. O. A. Hale and Miss Clarisse Hale will leave early in the fall on a tour abroad of several months.

Mr. and Mrs. J. B. Coryell will leave in the fall on an Eastern trip of some months.

Mrs. Du Bois and her daughters, the Misses Du Bois, have taken apartments at the Hillcrest.

Mrs. Harold Cloke, who came to California on account of the illness of her mother, Mrs. Thomas Findley, will leave September 7th to join her husband, Capt. Cloke, U. S. A., just ordered to Fort Williams, Me. Mrs. George Gardiner, formerly Edith Findley, who came to California with her sister, Mrs. Cloke, will leave the same day for her home in Boston. Mr. Gardiner has formed a partnership with his brother-in-law, Mr. Frank Findley. The Frank Findleys will leave for Boston about the same time and take up their residence there. They have rented their home in Sausalito for a term of years.

Among th recent arrivals at the Hotel Jefferson are: H. R. O'Bryan, Monterey; Mr. and Mrs. Melville Dozier, Chico; Mr. and Mrs. A. B. Miller, Marysville; Mr. and Mrs. J. F. Howard, Mr. and Mrs. H. W. Montgomery, Los Angeles; Mrs. F. S. Rice and Miss Rice, Bakersfield; C. G. Elliott and wife, Stockton; C. S. Wright, Mrs. S. E. Halsted, Mrs. A. H. Lackland, R. S. Parker, Miss G. K. Brown, Miss Florence Hill, Mr. and Mrs. Edward G. Keen, Honolulu; Mr. and Mrs. C. G. Steror, J. F. Elliott and family, Mr. and Mrs. R. W. Mill and Miss Marie Scott, Sacramento.

The pretty country home of Mr. and Mrs. Charles E. Maud of Rutherford, Napa county, has been turned over to Judge and Mrs. Oliver P. Evans. Mr. and Mrs. Maud have taken possession of their house at Monterey and will remain there during the golf and tennis tournament at Del Monte.

Mrs. William P. Miller and her daughter, Miss Elna Miller, have returned to California, after a four months' tour of Old Mexico, where Mr. Miller is now located in business. After a short stay in Los Angeles visiting Miss Miller's cousins, the J. R. Millers, they will return to their home here.

The Fairmont Hotel for the past week has been the scene of the notable gatherings of the National Convention of the Association of Collegiate Alumnae which met for the first time in the West. The Association is composed of the graduates of the various womens' colleges and among the delegates present were women from nearly every college in the land. At the reception Monday night more than eight hundred guests were present and listened with interest to the speeches by Miss Helen Wooster Peckham of San Jose, President of the local organization; Mrs. Cheney, First Vice President of the National Association; Mayor Taylor of San Francisco and Miss Laura Drake Gill of Washington, D. C., the President of the Alumnae. Teas, auto rides and other social entertainments sprinkled the meetings during the rest of the week.

The Del Monte Golf Tournament

With a record-breaking start of over a half hundred entries the Del Monte Golf Tournament began last Monday. As the entry list for each day's play does not close until 6 P. M. of the preceding day this banner count will be probably more than doubled before the week's play is over. The principal feature of the tournament was the Del Monte Handicap Cup, which is open for play by any amateur in either the men's or women's classes. Consolation prizes and trophies were also offered for those who qualified but did not reach the finals in the cup play. At the time this paper goes to press no records are obtainable but it is safe to predict that with the array of expert players on the course many new scores have been made and not a few records broken during the week.

Excellent Novelties at the Orpheum

The bill at the Orpheum this week is one of the old-time favorite kind, plentifully besprinkled with high-class turns, which leads from something good to something better. It tickles the fancy of the discriminating patrons, for none of them, be he ever so jaded, slips away before the drop of the final curtain. There is a nice balancing of all those happy acts in "street musicians," "mystics," "playlets," "character singing," "renowned gymnasts," "comedy divertisements," "sextet successes" and other acts, dubbed into publicity by the hustling press agent, to pad a half dozen ordinary vaudeville shows. The sketch this week is furnished by Edna Phillips, a newcomer on the circuit, but a capable young actress who will make her mark in this line, if conscientious work, energy and a quick sense of the physical presentation of the lines count for anything. The acting of her playlet, "Lost—A Kiss in Central Park," hinges on the two ideas that "her Jack" stole a kiss from her in the park on the same evening that her lively maid slipped away to the French ball and lost one of her mistress' diamond garters. In a merry mood Henrietta, in order to show Jack that she is not so angry over the stolen kiss as she pretended to be, advertises in a morning paper for the "lost" kiss and signs "Honey." The greatly distressed maid advertises for the garter in the same column and signs the same name. That kisses and garters do not always sail the amorous seas of life amicably together is quickly developed in the action. There is a lunatic asylum near by the "honey" domicile, one of the inmates gets mixed up with the garter and the kiss, and thereafter it appears very much as if Jack and the rest of the characters were in a "dippy house." The wild confusion that follows appals even the lunatic. Of course the kiss and garter eventually reach their rightful owner. The action is wildly hilarious and "by those who like this sort of thing this sort of thing is liked." The Wilson Brothers yodel, sing and "josh" their way into the approval of the audience. They concoct a German dialect of their own manufacture and the brand produces spontaneous laughter. The Grassys are new faces in local vaudeville and won a place for themselves with their clever and surprising novelties in mimicry, balancing and eccentric music making. Very finished and skillful accordeon playing is contributed by Dolesch and Zillbauer, Viennese street musicians. Carter and Bluford furnish some ingenious character songs decorated with their own appropriate stage settings. Good as their stunts are they are not the best to be had of these artists, as the act does not furnish opportunities for their unusual singing and dancing talents. In the gymnast line the Four Baltus surpass anything ever seen here. The strong man of the quartet is a modern Hercules, a marvel in the way he picks up his fellows and holds aloft their stiffened forms by the exercise of sheer muscle. Those clever youngsters Eugene and Willie Howard exude so much fun and wit as "The Hebrew Messenger Boy and the Thespian" that the management has kept them going churning out new laughs. The lads are versatile, sophisticated, make their fine points with good judgment and sing with a youthful vim and spirit to rouse the enthusiasm of the old stagers in the house. Classy and distinctly by themselves are the De Haven Sextet in their dancing operetta, "The Understudy." It is a finished act of excellent singing and dancing that might have been lifted from the latest Broadway success and transferred to the Orpheum. The stage set is a picture, the girls are pretty, chic, handsomely costumed and sing and dance with a dash and go that is inspiriting. Sydney Gibson, the sole man in the group, contributes several new songs in a cleverly entertaining way.

New Theatre Opens Here

The new Valencia Theatre, on Valencia street, between Thirteenth and Fourteenth, will be formally opened Saturday night, September 12th, with a high-class stock company headed by Robert Warwick and Miss Willette Kershaw. The opening production will be "The Great Ruby," a play originally presented with great success in London, by Cecil Raleigh. There will be a company of thirty-five associate players, and the claim is made that the Valencia stock company will soon be recognized as the strongest and best stock company ever seen in San Francisco. Mr. Warwick is well known as a leading man who has been identified with the successes of many stars. while Miss Kershaw is an extremely beautiful young woman, who is credited with scoring many successes in the East. Sedley Brown will be the stage director of the new house. The Valencia Theatre is said to be one of the most beautiful playhouses in the West. It is strictly fireproof, handsomely decorated, and has a seating capacity of 1,700. The dressing rooms are marvels of comfort for the players, with hot and cold water in each room. Brussells carpets on the floors, and all the modern improvements. Many surprises are promised for the opening night, which is expected to prove something of a stellar event in the theatrical history of San Francisco.

Success of "The Man of the Hour"

"The Man of the Hour" continues to draw large audiences at the Van Ness Theater, where it will remain the attraction for a third and last week, commencing with the special holiday matinee on Labor Day, Monday, September 7th. This matinee will be given at special prices. "The Man of the Hour" has attained one of the greatest successes of any modern American production. It is a powerful play, each one of the four acts being crowded with interesting moments. The story of "push" politics is interspersed with a pretty love interest and the comedy, furnished in the main by the character of Alderman Phelan, is also well placed. Cyril Scott and the other members of the cast are all capable people. The Broadhurst drama will be seen for the last time on Sunday night, September 13th.

The next attraction at the Van Ness Theatre will be the musical play, "The Girl Question." It comes here after a run of over three hundred consecutive performances in Chicago. A splendid cast of musical comedy people, headed by Paul Nicholson, will appear, surrounded by a chorus which entitles it to be called the girliest of girl shows. Seats for "The Girl Question" will be on sale Thursday.

The Warfield Season at the Alcazar

When he makes his first entrance in "The Music Master" at the Alcazar next Monday evening David Warfield will face an audience of his townsfolk for the first time since he closed his memorable engagement in "The Auctioneer" eight years ago at the old Columbia Theatre. That was such a wonderful attraction that the playhouse could not accommodate one-half the number of people who sought admission during its two weeks stay, and the situation promises to be the same at the Alcazar next week. In the history of San Francisco theatricals there has never been so great an advance demand for tickets as that which has assailed the Alcazar box office since Mr. Warfield's coming season was first announced. Perhaps no figure in native drama has left such an impressively beautiful memory in the American mind as Warfield's superbly artistic and marvelously human creation. Herr von Barwig, the music master, a character symbolizing the kind of love that knits humanity, makes religions and brings its own reward of happiness. It is a character into which the dramatist, the philosopher, the poet and the actor have breathed life. It is a character and interpretation that teach the philosophy and beauty of love as sincerely as, and much more poignantly than the greatest essays of the world's great teachers. Warfield reaches the mind by way of the heart, opening up the fundamental well-springs of our emotions and lodging finally in the goal of our reason. According to the long-established Belasco custom, Mr. Warfield will bring with him the splendid supporting company that assisted in his New York success. David Belasco never lowers the artistic standard of his companies when he sends them "on the road." Usually they are the same actors who created their respective roles, but if occasionally circumstances do not permit of this, in every case the substitute is as good as, or better than, the originator. Mr. Warfield has in support some of the original members of "The Auctioneer" company, and, in almost every instance, those who will appear in "The Music Master" at the Alcazar are of the personnel that acted in the New York premiere five years ago. "The Music Master" is announced to run two weeks and will be followed by Mr. Warfield's latest success, "A Grand Army Man."

Another Success at the Princess

Ferris Hartman will conclude his successful run in "The Toy Maker" this Sunday night. At a special matinee next Monday, Labor Day, the delightful musical eccentricity, "The Wizard of the Nile" will be superbly presented with magnificent and picturesque oriental scenery and costumes and a splendid cast, the chief feature of which will be Mr. Hartman in his inimitable role of Kibosh, a Persian magician making a professional tour of Egypt. It was in this role that Mr. Hartman achieved one of the most brilliant successes of his career at the Tivoli. One of the chief attractions of "The Wizard of the Nile" will be the first appearance at this theatre of the gifted young prima donna, Miss Sybil Page, who as the Princess Cleopatra will be afforded abundant opportunity to distinguish herself. Zoe Barnett is happily cast as Abydos, the magician's apprentice, and Sarah Edwards will have great lyric and dramatic opportunity as Simoona. Arthur Cunningham will be Cheops, the royal weather bureau, and Wallace Brownlow, Ptarmigan. The other characters will be cast very strongly.

High-Class Vaudeville at the Orpheum

The Orpheum bill for next week, like good wine needs no bush, for it contains some of the very best acts in vaudeville. The Trapnell family of acrobats, who will make their first appearance in this city, are something out of the ordinary. The troupe consists of three women, a man and a youth. All their evolutions are performed with great agility and grace. They were a great sensation in Europe and in the East. The great charm of the performance of the Trapnell Family is its complete novelty. Amelia Summerville, who will make her first appearance at the Orpheum, is one of the cleverest and most popular musical comedy actresses in this country and her vaudeville debut is sure to be an event of more than ordinary interest. She will present a clever musical monologue, entitled, "Mrs. Get-Rich-Quick's Supper Party," in which she introduces impersonations of Harry Lauder, May Irwin, Eva Tanguay, Donald Brian and other stage celebrities. She will also sing "Take Me to the Ball Game," "It Looks Like a Black Night Tonight," "That Wasn't All" and other clever and amusing ditties. The three

AMELIA SUMMERVILLE

Who will make her first appearance at the Orpheum the week of September 7th, in the bright musical monologue, "Mrs. Get-Rich-Quick's Supper Party."

Moshers, expert cyclists and exponents of fun and skill on the wheel, will be a feature of the program. Two of the Moshers are wonderfully skilled cyclists and the third is a quaint and diverting comedian. They were a great hit at the New York Theatre Roof Garden. Fred Warren and Al Blanchard, minstrel and musical comedy stars, will contribute to the enjoyment of the performance. Next week will be the last of the Grassys, the Wilson Brothers and Carter and Bluford. Edna Phillips, who has scored a great hit in the bright little skit, "Lost—A Kiss in Central Park," will also close her engagement with this performance. A new series of motion pictures will be presented.

"Bohemian Girl" at the American

The Persse-Mason Opera Company, which has been singing Offenbach's melodious opera, "The Love Tales of Hoffmann," at the American Theater for the past two weeks, will sing Balfe's beautiful ballad opera, "The Bohemian Girl," for one week, commencing with the Sunday matinee, September 6th. No more popular opera than "The Bohemian Girl" has ever been written, and the Irish composer's great work will be revived on a most sumptuous scale by the management of the American Theater. The production will be produced under the stage direction of Mr. Charles Swickard, while the melodious music will be rendered by an augmented orchestra under the leadership of Mr. Paul Steindorff. Such numbers as "I Dreamt that I Dwelt in Marble Halls," "The Heart Bowed Down," "The Fair Land of Poland," "Then You'll Remember Me," will live as long as music itself. Edith Mason will be heard in the role of Arline, a part in which she has appeared with much success in all sections of the country. The remainder of the cast will include Thomas H. Persse, who will appear as Thaddius. Devilshoof will be in the hands of the clever comedian, Robert Lett. Charles Swickard will sing his old role of Count Arnheim. The other characters will be portrayed by Bernice Holmes, Joseph Fogarty, H. Emerson Nixon, and Mabel Goger. In addition to the regular Saturday and Sunday matinees, there will be special afternoon performances given on next Monday, (Labor Day) and Wednesday, (Admission Day).

Joint Concert Announced

Manager Will Greenbaum announces a joint concert by Mrs. Beatrice Priest Fine, the well-known soprano, who has been living in New York for the past few years, and Miss Anna Miller Wood, contralto, another Californian who has won an enviable place in the musical field of the East. Both of these artists are here visiting their families for the summer vacation and our local impressario immediately took advantage of the fact to arrange a concert in which both will appear as soloist and also sing some very beautiful duets. The affair will be given Thursday evening, October 22nd, at Christian Science Hall. The prices will be popular, viz., $1.00 and 75 cents. Seats may be reserved by mail by addressing Will L. Greenbaum, care of Sherman, Clay & Co.

The Lloyd Scott Travel Talks

The series of illustrated "Travel-Talks" by Lloyd Scott will open Monday night, October 5th, at Christian Science Hall. The subjects will be "Egypt," "Japan," "India," "Russia" and "Ireland." The entire course will also be given at Maple Hall, Oakland, under the local direction of Mrs. Zoe Green Radcliffe.

Stage Limelight

Mme. Blanche Arral, a member of the Opera Comique of Paris, has just completed a tour of the French provinces in Java, etc. On the road home she gave concerts in Australia, meeting with a sensational success and is at present resting in Honolulu.

DAVID WARFIELD

To appear in "The Music Master" at the Alcazar, commencing Monday evening, September 7th.

She will visit this city on her way to Vancouver, but it is doubtful if any public appearances will be made, as her specialty is work with big orchestras, and San Francisco is deficient in this regard.

Louis James has secured the entire Richard Mansfield production of "Peer Gynt" and will bring it here some weeks hence. James should find the leading role in this play eminently fitted to his best style of stage work. The production is said to be the most elaborate ever brought out by Mansfield and will be seen here in its entirety.

"Paid in Full" will be seen at the Van Ness Theater before the close of the year. It is still running to immense audiences in New York and Chicago. The other play by the author of "Paid in Full" is called "The Wolf" and is also booked for this season.

Among the early bookings for the Van Ness Theatre will be found "The Girl Question," "The Time, the Place and the Girl," Dustin Farnum; Louis James in "Peer Gynt," "Paid in Full," "The Wolf," "The Merry Widow."

Odd Things in the World

The Apaches of Big Cities

The Apache of Paris has his prototype in the London Hooligan, but the latter substitutes for the loaded firearms of the Frenchman a heavily weighted stick and a belt with a metal clasp. The assault on Sir W. S. Gilbert as he was coming home from the opera the other night has called attention to this particular type of scoundrel. Fortunately Sir William was able to frighten his assailants, but there are many who are less fortunate. So frequent have street attacks become that specially trained detectives from Scotland Yard have been assigned to these cases. It is, of course, impossible to give the number of hooligans in London, but it is estimated that there are several thousands and they are increasing daily. Detachments of this formidable army infest every district. The typical London hooligan is a short, slim youth with the alert daring look of a ferret. About his throat is invariably wound a muffler of varied hues and a cap is well pulled down over his eyes. The Silver Hatchet Gang is the title of the group which hails from Hoxton. At Islington they call themselves the Knuckledusters, at Lambeth the Girdle Gang. Then there are the Bethnal Green Boys, the Boys of Bow, the Deptford Terrors, the Hackney Bruisers, the Bermondsey Tips and the Old Ford Boys.

"Mystic Millinery" the Latest

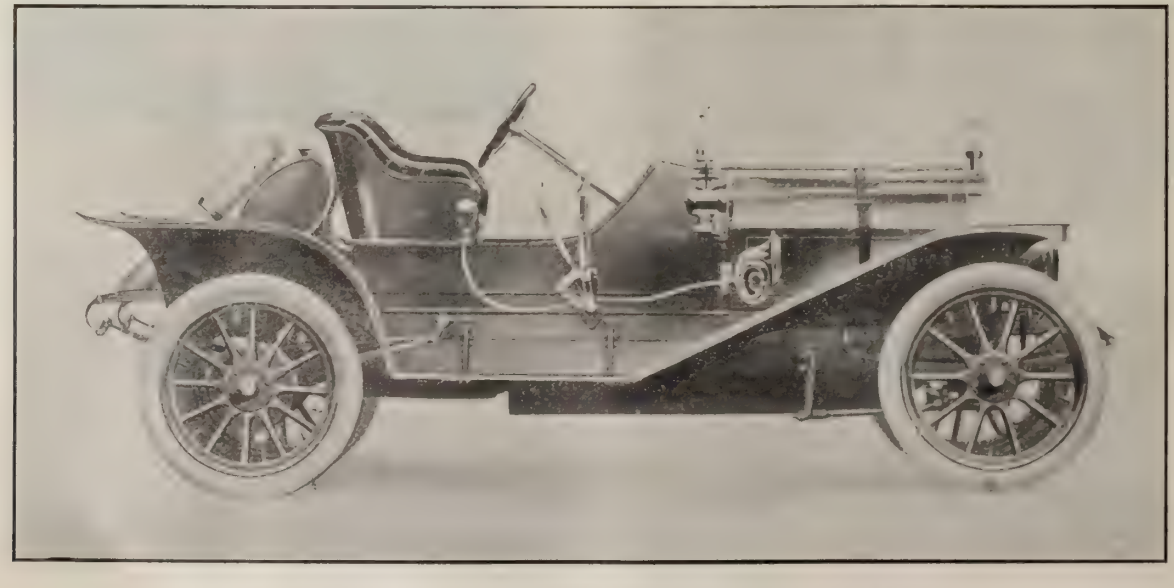
"Mystic Millinery" is the product of a London concern which proposes to fit out its customers to suit their horoscopes instead of merely following Paris fashions. Two examples shown of mystic millinery are the Saturn Venus hat, a pretty mass of white lace and muslin trimmed with wheat ears and cornflowers, with blue tulle around the crown, and the Venus Mercury hat, carried out in pearl gray muslin trimmed with pink and blue Chinese asters with silver green foliage. The astrological experts allow the wearer of the latter to choose gray, pale blue or pale pink strings—as the stars, apparently, are not so particular about the shade of the strings.

Consoled Widows and Widowers

A curious, and we fear impertinent, Parisian statistician has been looking into the vital statistics with a view to finding out the period of time which elapses before Parisian widows and widowers remarry. He finds that out of every hundred widowers, seventy-three are remarried within the first year after the death of wife number one. Fifteen more wait until just after the end of the first year. After the lapse of six weeks more ten others get married. Only two are not to be consoled and continue in their status of widowers till the end of their lives. The gentler sex, it appears, is more constant to the memory of the dead—partly because a law forbids their remarriage until three-quarters of a year has elapsed. As soon as this prohibition ceases twenty-five per cent marry again. Fifty per cent are not in so great a hurry and wait from a year to two years after the loss of the first husband before they take a second. Eight out of every hundred wait as long as five years. As for the others who never remarry, the ungallant statistician says that most of them remain widows because their age makes it necessary.

How He Squeezed the Bank

The Bank of France is obliged by French law to replace a damaged bank note by a new one so long as the number on the old note is legible. The Matin vouches for the truth of the following story: Some years ago a clerk inherited $4,000, which he changed into twenty bank notes of $200 each. Next day he went back to the bank and handed in these notes, dirty and damaged, and obtained new notes. This he did every day except Sunday for three weeks. The matter was then reported to the governor, who sent for the clerk and inquired as to the reason for his extraordinary procedure.



"That is my business," was the reply. "The law gives me a perfect right to exchange dirty bank notes for clean notes half a dozen times a day if I choose."

"But," said the governor, "every new bank note we give you costs us about 15 cents. You are costing us $3.00 a day."

"Exactly," replied the clerk. "I have a proposition to make to you. I will promise to cease dirtying bank notes if you will agree to pay me $2.50 per day." The bank agreed to do so and the man has been living on the proceeds ever since.

Auto Notes

Word was received yesterday by the Pioneer Automobile Company to the effect that the demonstrating car of the new six cylinder Thomas and the new Model F. Thomas will leave the factory next week. This six cylinder is the first of the low priced Thomas cars of this type to be brought to the coast.

One of the most complete lines of motor cars to be turned out by one factory will be that of the Thomas factory next season. The Thomas' styles will run from the 6-cylinder 70 horsepower down to the 4 cylinder 16 horsepower Town cars. The 4-cylinder sixty horsepower Flyer and the new 6-cylinder 40 horse power cars will also be made in Limousine and touring car, flyabout and tourabout bodies. The first of these cars will be shipped next week.

Governor Gillett is the guest of J. M. Carson of Eureka on a fishing trip. They motored to Soule's bungalow on the Eel river in the Carson White steamer and are enjoying a number of trips about Humboldt and Mendocino counties.

J. M. McGee, a prominent attorney of Oroville, has been in town several days journeying about in his new straight-line big White steamer.

Calvin C. Eib, Vice-President of the Pioneer Automobile Company, returned yesterday from an extended trip in th southern part of the State. Mr. Eib reports the trade outlook in the interior part of the State as being promising, especially in Fresno and vicinity. "There are more large cars around Fresno than there are in Los Angeles," he said, in discussing his trip. "While the demand for small cars, such as the Chalmers-Detroit is very great, the large Thomas Flyer and touring cars of 40 h. p. are also finding plenty of buyers. I look for a good season in the interior of the State." Mr. Eib closed several contracts for the Chalmers-Detroit "30."

Mr. and Mrs. E. M. Chadbourne are touring in the southern part of the State in their big White steam car.

C. A. Long, traffic manager of the Overland Stage Company, operating an automobile stage line between Sherwood, Mendocino County, and Eureka, Humboldt County, has just made arrangements with E. P. Brinegar, of the Pioneer Automobile Company, for a shipment of Thomas Flyers, which he will put on the daily run of one hundred and five miles. In replacing the machines which he has been using for the past few months with Thomas cars, Long says that he simply wants to try one of the most powerful made cars on the market. "The cars are called upon to make the one hundred and five mile trip over the mountains daily," said Mr. Long, "and it will take the best kind of material in the automobile to stand the test. I expect to have the Thomas cars at work next week."

R. A. Smythe, the agent of White steam cars at Eureka, was in San Francisco a few days this week. He reports the outlook for the new season favorable. Smythe says the Whites he sold during the past season in that territory are all giving the best of satisfaction.

Jack Heyfer, driving a White steamer, reeled off sixty-four miles an hour over a section of the Los Angeles-Pasadena boulevard near Bairdstown one day this week. The first performance was for the purpose of testing the qualities of petrolithic pavement in resisting the suction of rubber tires. A photograph was taken of the machine in full swing, which will be sent to Walter Page, director of the good roads office of the United States. Mr. Page will be asked to include it with a number which he is going to present at the international good roads conference in Paris.

Here is an account of fast driving of early day stage coaches that will delight later day automobilists. It is taken from the Annual Register for 1816:

A new coach was started in the spring to run to Brighton, a distance of fifty-two miles, in six hours.  * * This, however, became alarming, particularly in the populous neighborhood of Newington, through which it passed, and the parish officers there caused information to be laid against the drivers for driving furiously on the public road so as to endanger the lives of his Majesty's subjects.

The result of this is to be read in Hansard's "Parliamentary Reports," June 10, 1816.

The Attorney-General moved for leave to bring in a bill, the object of which was the protection of the lives and limbs of his Majsty's subjects, by correcting the enormous abuses of stage coach drivers. Within these few days it would be hardly credible what a number of applications he had received on this subject. Some accounts were enough to freeze one with horror. A gentleman of veracity had informed him that on Tuesday, May 21, at half past 5, the Trafalgar and Regulator coaches set off from Manchester and got to Liverpool twenty minutes after 8, doing this journey in two hours and fifty minutes, at the rate of twelve miles an hour.

backward with a blow on the chest, and broke the strong rod across his knee as though it had been a straw.

"Blind with rage, Vialli was on the point of flinging himself upon the other; but it had gone too far. The dread that had held us spellbound, passed away. A dozen, a score of men, sprang between them, I among the rest; and finding myself beside the count, I drew him away, into another room.

"He had shown admirable courage and self-control. Even now, not a tremor betrayed the frightful emotion that he must have passed through. Everyone agreed in condemning Vialli. To caluminate a lady, against whom no one had ever heard a word uttered; to defame the memory of a dead woman without the least possible excuse, and in such a place, before so many people, was too great a folly, almost a crime. 'I know that I was in the wrong,' he himself exclaimed, in the adjoining room, 'but I do not propose to accept insults tamely.' The result was that, being unable to induce any of those present to serve him as seconds, he was forced to seek them from outside.

"The count, for his part, begged with a calm courtesy to give him my services for the occasion, referring me to the Baron Narconi as his other witness. 'Accept any conditions,' he said; 'my only wish is to have an early meeting. Not later than tomorrow, if possible,' and with these words he left me. And so it was arranged for eight o'clock the next morning.

"That same evening I left a note with the count's doorkeeper, and in the morning at seven, I called at his home, accompanied by the Baron Narconi. We were shown into his study, while a servant went to announce us. We waited and we waited; no one came. A clock in the neighborhood struck the first quarter after seven; and still no one came. It is hard to give you an idea of the embarrassment in which this extraordinary state of things placed us.

"We were finally driven to do something definite; I reached for the button of the electric bell and rang it. The same servant reappeared. 'Did you tell the count that we were here?' 'Yes, sir, .' 'Then speak to him again, and say that there is no time to lose.'

"A few minutes later the door opened and the count appeared. He came forward slowly; and in a ceremonious tone, as though speaking to strangers, asked us: 'In what way can I serve you, gentlemen?' I will not waste time trying to give you an idea of our stupefaction, for it already verged upon contempt. 'Pardon me,' I said,' 'but I wrote you last night that the meeting was arranged for this morning, at eight.' 'Ah!' he rejoined, and he seemed to descend from the clouds. He still wore the clothes of the night before, the same rumpled shirt; it was evident that he had kept them on all night. 'Everything is ready,' the baron told him, 'and it is now half past seven.' The count passed his hand across his brow: 'Well, do we need to go?' Imagine our sensations!

"In the carriage no one spoke a word. The count gazed out at the flitting panorama, but his right arm was trembling where it lay, thrust into the breast of his coat. I began to feel a lively anxiety. What had gone before made me fear that worse was yet to come, after we should reach the dueling grounds. My principal was afraid to fight; that was the conviction that had been borne in upon me, in spite of the dramatic scene we had witnessed the night before.

"We reached our goal. It was a princely villa, within the court of which, sheltered from prying eyes, the encounter was to take place. The encounter! But Count Von Bauern seemed to be in a mood for anything else on earth sooner than fighting. He was gazing off into the distance, holding his head between his hands, plucking the leaves from the shrubs—and shivering.

"Notwithstanding the time we had lost, we were the first on the grounds. We heard a carriage drive up; our doctor had come. A few minutes later the others all arrived. After greeting them I turned to look for the count. He had disappeared! He had passed beyond the limits of the court, and was leaning against the iron railing, down in one corner of the garden. I went up to him and led him back, saying with an emphasis that seemed to me only too well justified: 'I hope, count, that you are not going to lose your presence of mind.' The others also came forward. Then, as Count Von Bauern's glance fell upon Vialli, he burst into a peal of laughter——.

"To convey the impression which that peal of laughter made among us all is impossible; an unforseen clap of thunder from a clear sky could have produced nothing like it. But a ray like a lightning flash suddenly illumined my mind, and I sprang forward toward the count. Our doctor had, however, forstalled me. Stopping me with a gesture, and pointing to the count's disordered features, his twitching eyelids, his lips mumbling meaningless words, he said decisively: 'This duel is impossible. The gentleman is not in possession of his mental faculties!' And suddenly, as if in confirmation of this opinion, the count violently tore away his clothes, fumbling with one hand in his breast. He was quite mad——"

"Ah, from fear?" interrupted the lawyer.

"No," answered Baldassare Gargano.

"From what, then?"

"You want to know why the Count Von Bauern had gone mad? Because the assertion Vialli had made in the billiard room was true; because Augusto Stecchi had really been the lover of the countess——"

"What!" exclaimed everyone.

"It seems impossible, doesn't it? Yet such was the case. Returning home that evening, with the terrible words still ringing in his ears, how must the count have felt? What gnawing suspicion had made its way into his brain? Through what insensible degrees, or by what rapid transition, did the indignation roused by the vile calumny give place to torturing doubt? What proofs, what clues, what memories rose up in his mind and took definite form? No one can ever tell. We may know only the facts; and the known facts are these: that, for the first time since the death of his wife, the count that evening entered the room formerly occupied by the dead woman, the room which had been reverently kept in precisely the same state in which she had left it. No one followed him into that room; but when we called the next morning, the servant found his master there. In that room, hidden in a tiny closet, the key to which was usually kept in the countess's work-basket, the count found the letters Augusto had written to his wife. Hundreds of letters, palpable proofs—the most eloquent, most irrefutable of proofs!—of all that Vialli had asserted. Their relations, interrupted by death, had lasted more than two years; and no one, or almost no one, had suspected it. And the widower had dedicated himself, body and soul, to the memory of that idolized wife!

"It must have been a frightful disillusion, a crushing blow. His love for the countess had been his whole life. When the living woman had been taken from him, there still remained in his heart the immaterial figure, the pure ideal; and in this worship which survived the tomb, the man still found a reason, a single reason, for living. Then came the horrible catastrophe, the profanation of a memory, the death of a faith! What more is there to say? I have given you only the results, the overthrow of his reason, following upon long hours of mental anguish, and hastened by the sight of the man who first revealed the hideous truth.

"After the doctor rendered his decision, Mendoza, his principal, exclaimed, gazing helplessly around: 'This is a case without a precedent!' I shall never forget the air of wonder, bewilderment, curiosity, indignation, incredulity that spread over his face, in the presence of that mad laughter and the physician's verdict. 'A case without a precedent!' A faith destroyed, a shattered intellect, a terrible drama played to the end in a human soul, were all reduced, in the opinion of that gentleman, to a case without precedent in the jurisprudence of chivalry."

L. H. Johnson, of the National Auto Company, Los Angeles, reports a case of long tire service that is worthy of mention. On May 14th, 1907, he received a 35 horsepower Triumph Roadster, fitted with 36x3½ inch Diamond tires to front and 36x4 inch Bailey tread Diamonds to rear. On August 9th, 1908, the car had been run 9,880 miles without a tire having been touched except for occasional inflation. On that date a rear casing blew out and was replaced with a new one. On August 24th, with an odometer record of 10,534 miles, a front tube went down over night and it was necessary from lack of time to run several miles on the flat tire, thus ruining both casing and tube. At this writing there are two of the original tires on the car, both in good condition and apparently good for several hundreds of miles additional service. The car has been run through sand, rocky washes and has received more than the average amount of hard usage.

Oliver Hirst, probably one of the best known rent drivers in the state, has just returned from a trip through Nevada in a Thomas Flyer touring car. Hirst reports the roads in the sagebrush country in fair shape, although his car bears evidence of the sand and dust on the trip.

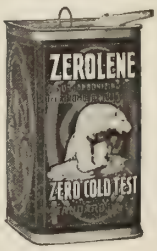
Napoleon never breakfasted at the same hour. Now he would breakfast at 7, now at 11, now at 10. Yet, whenever he rang for his breakfast a young broiled chicken was always brought immediately to him, cooked to perfection, just off the grill.

One morning Napoleon sent for his cook and said, with a pleased laugh:

"How do you manage it that, no matter when I breakfast, my chicken is always ready, done to a turn?"



"Sire," said the cook, "every ten minutes I put a fresh chicken on to broil. Thus one is always perfectly done for you when you ring."

Letters

A Novel Worth Reading

Professor Robert Herrick does not write a novel every week in the year, but when he does it is safe to predict that readers of others than the sensational sex will sit up and take notice. It is five years since the appearance of "The Memoirs of an American Citizen," and now we have "Together," which deals with married life as it is lived amongst the plutocracy and those aspiring to a position in the favored lists. The theme of the societl woman in what she designates "home" has been worn somewhat threadbare of late, the extravagance, the mad seeking after excitement, and the sordid end of it all, but Professor Herrick has given us a view from a different angle. It is not all bridge and cigarettes, and dinners. Neither is it all flration and divorce. Indeed divorce is hardly mentioned at all and the women are on the whole, distinctly superior in manners and morals to those who are usually put forward as the exponents of "Society." Mr. Herrick has undertaking to show, and has shown into what modern marriage has deteriorated in a society in which the man is simply the ample provided and the woman the eager disburser of the spoils of business. That it is an essentially true picture no one need attempt to deny, for it is only necessary to open our eyes and look about us and note the tendency of even moderate prosperity to confirm it. The canvas on which the picture is painted is a large one and the scene shifts from East to West, bringing in some thirty or forty characters, first and last. The central point is a certain group of young girls all educated at the same fashionable school, all in approximately the same financial circumstances and social rank, and all in time married, and the plan of the panorama is the depicting of what each has made of her marriage. These are not what is unusally denominated the smart set, with its monkey dinners and bizarre entertainments, but rather, the set up whom it is supposed that the regeneration of society must rest. They arc of those who have been educated away from the old idea that a woman should be absorbed in her husband and children, and who are alive to the privileges of "culture," and individuality. The main trouble with them is that despite their convictions to the contrary, not on of them is an individual in the larger sense of the word. They are essentially mob-minded, and their sole conception of following the dictates of their finer sensibilities consists in doing precisely what all the rest do, only a little more of it. There is a vague and hazy notion floating about in their heads that a man needs to be spurred on to his best efforts by the demands made of him on behalf of his family, so while the husbands toil at "business," which charming women are not supposed to understand, the wives virtually live apart from them, flitting from hotel to resort, from country house to city mansion, and from New York to Europe, taking all and giving nothing. They are nervous wrecks, eaten up by their selfish ekotisms. They are neither mothers, housekeepers nor mates in any sense of the word, but useless and extravagant parasites, not even ornamental, since they are eternally undergoing expensive treatments for their imaginary or self-induced woes. Mr. Herrick simply paints the picture as he sees it. He offers no solution to the problem, unless it be the suppression of the ego. Unfortunately, the whole trend of modern education is in the direction of the cultivation of egotism. The children in the public schools, from the kindergarten up are encouraged to the belief that they are each and all to become leaders, and that duty must ever give way to inclination. Eclectic courses of study, school strikes and other demonstrations of insubordination are permitted if not directly encouraged, and the consequence is peevishness, fretful, restlessness and dissatisfaction with everything that interferes with personal ease. "Together" has become a lost motive. "The old order changes, giving place"—not to new, but to disruption. The cumulaties effects of years cannot be set aside in a day. In a society where the men do all of the work and he woman all of the play, it is inevitable that the two must drift apart. We may agree or disagree with Professor Herrick's arraignment, but one cannot ignore it. Published by Macmillan.

SUMMONS

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA, IN AND FOR THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO.

No. 15,983.

NANCY THERESA BERGEMAN-HAVERLY,
Plaintiff,

vs.

PAUL J. BERGEMAN-HAVERLY,
Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA send greeting to PAUL J. BERGEMAN-HAVERLY, Defendant.

YOU ARE HEREBY REQUIRED to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, on the ground of defendant's extreme cruelty towards plaintiff, also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

GIVEN under my hand and the Seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 14th day of April, A. D. 1908.

SUMMONS

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA, IN AND FOR THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO.

No. 10,530.

CATHERINE STAPLETON,
Plaintiff,

vs.

ALL PERSONS CLAIMING ANY INTEREST IN OR LIEN UPON, THE REAL PROPERTY HEREIN DESCRIBED, OR ANY PART THEREOF.
Defendants.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA to all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described, or any part thereof, Defendants, Greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Catherine Stapleton, plaintiff, filed with the Clerk of the above-entitled Court and County, within three (3) months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property, or any part thereof, situate, lying and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and particularly described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the westerly line of Franklin street, at its intersection with the northerly line of Ivy avenue, and running thence northerly along said westerly line of Franklin street twenty-five (25) feet, thence at right angles westerly and parallel with the north line of Ivy avenue one hundred and seven (107) feet six (6) inches, thence at right angles southerly twenty-five (25) feet to the northerly line of Ivy avenue, thence at right angles easterly and along said northerly line of Ivy avenue one hundred and seven (107) feet six (6) inches to the westerly line of Franklin street, and at the point of commencement, being a portion of Western Addition, Block No. 139.

And you are hereby notified that unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit:

That it be adjudged that the plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple absolute; that her title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiff recover her costs herein and have such other and further relief as may be meet in the premises.

WITNESS my hand and the seal of said Court, this 31st day of August, A. D. 1908.

Rockefeller's Buried Ancestors

Speaking of the recently discovered "family tree" of John D. Rockefeller, what does it signify that the richest man in the world "can trace his lineage" back to a nobility composed largely of Rockefellers? Those noble ancestors are all quite dead, and many of them have been long forgotten. What vanity is this that induces one of an opulent posterity to dig them up and hang them on a "family tree?" Would it not have been sufficient to know that none of the ancient Rockefellers had been hanged on a gallows-tree? Alas for the instability of human desire—though we have all we need and all that is good for us, we never cease to crave for that which we have not. Rockefeller was bald and he yearned for hair; Rockefeller was only a father and he rejoiced with exceeding great joy when he was proclaimed a grandfather; Rockefeller was poor of stomach and he would then have given many millions to eat the things that are eaten by hired men and penniless tramps on the highway; Rockefeller is rich beyond the dreams of all human avarice, yet he is still possessing himself of worldly gear; Rockefeller was lacking an ancestry and he would have one whatever the cost—a noble ancestry upon which he could look back with pride from his lonely pinnacle of wealth heaped on wealth. But what does it profit Rockefeller to know that his most distant progenitors were belted knights and earls of high degree? What will it profit the dead folk of the noble house of Rockefeller? Will Rockefeller weep over the graves of his ancestors as Mark Twain wept over the grave of his most distant relation, Adam Twain? Will Rockefeller erect costly monuments to the memory of his unmonumented dead, as Carnegie erects libraries to perpetuate his own memory? We fail to discern the slightest value of this posthumous Rockefeller nobility. They cannot confer upon their rich relation any of their titles, and he cannot enrich them by giving them any of his money. But stay; there is a way out of this dark backward and abysm of Rockefeller aristocracy. Happy thought! Let us all set the lineage tracers at work on our several pedigrees with instructions to show if possible that somewhere in the misty past our family trees were branched upon the Rockefeller tree. It is certain that the last will and testament of John D. Rockefeller will contain generous bequests to all his relatives, however distant. Let us make haste while the sun shines on John. Let us search our family records in hope of finding ourselves collateral to Rockefeller. If necessary let us organize ourselves into a Rockefeller legacy trust of limited liability and unlimited possibilities. Thus will the newly discovered Rockefeller ancestry be made to assume beneficial tangibility and proper substance instead of wasting itself in crumbling urns and moss-grown tombs.

The Salome Dance

Not until the East is surfeited, or until some new appeal to the carnal appetite is invented, will the Salome dancers leg it across the Continent to San Francisco. Meanwhile we must possess our soul in patience. Perhaps the Merry Widow waltz will serve as a tidbit to titillate the palate for the feast; for this waltz, it is said, though tame and sedate in comparison with the antics of the Salome dance, is nevertheless wine to the emotions. From the newspaper descriptions of the Salome dance it is evident that for refined sensuosity it quite approximates the fantastic piece de resistance of the memorable Midway, and it is probably little more than an elaborate variation of the muscle dance which was introduced to this country by Belle Baya. As danced by Maud Allen in London the Salome dance is designed to illustrate the principal scene of the play written by Oscar Wilde which Richard Strauss converted into an opera. This is somewhat different from the dance of the Seven Veils in the opera, which was done by Olive Fremstad in New York, provoking the protest of John Pierpont Morgan's daughter, who objected principally to the lascivious manner in which the actress handled the head of St. John. At present Alice Hoffman, a chorus girl, who started her stage career at the Tivoli, is imitating Maud Allen in the East and introducing a few variations of her own. But none of the Salome dancers pretend to be giving anything that resembles the dance of the Biblical story. The nature of that dance we can but vaguely conjecture from what is known of the diversions of an epoch that was strangely fecund in curious things. Nor can we in our conjecturing imagine any kind of posturing more lewd in its suggestion than that whereby the modern Salome dancers are said to appeal to the imagination. But in this highly refined period of the world's history it is not easy to shock an audience by means of a dance. We applauded the muscle dance, we are tolerant of the most vulgar posturing of female contortionists and the provinces are now eager for the Salome dance, which is supposed to be akin to a performance that roused the jaded passions of the men of that monstrous and unnatural period when the Pantheon was a lupanar and a Ministry of Pleasure designed peculiar pastimes for the Caesars; when, according to Quintillan, the mouth did not dare describe what the eyes beheld. If the Salome dance is anything like the dance that was danced to the clashing of cymbals and the notes of lutes in the days of gigantic opulence and titanic sin, it must be very alluring and yet it can hardly be less decent than certain performances that have hitherto found favor. A faint conception of the genuine Salome dance may be formed with the assistance of Gustave Flaubert, who made an exhaustive study of the Caesarian epoch and who gives us an elaborate description in his "Herodias" of what he conceived the Salome dance to be. Flaubert tells us that Salome danced like the priestesses of the Indies, like the Nubian girls of the Cataracts and like the Bacchantes of Lydia. She threw herself in all directions like a flower tossed in a storm. Jewels flashed and leaped in her ears. "By stretching her legs apart," says Flaubert, "without bending her knees, she stooped so low that her chin touched the floor." And according to Flaubert the effect on the Roman soldiers, experts in debauchery, was worth describing, for he describes it. And he goes on: "Then she danced about Antipas's table in a frenzy of excitement, like a witch's rhombus. Antipas called to her to come, She danced on; the dulcimers sang out as if they would burst. She threw herself on her hands, heels in the air, and thus circled the platform like a huge scarab, then stopped abruptly. Her neck and her vertebrae were at right angles. The colored skirts that enveloped her legs, falling over her shoulders like a rainbow, framed her face a cubit from the floor." It was while in this position that Salome, according to Flaubert, called for the head of Iokanann on a charger. Have we not seen worse antics on the contemparary stage?

Langdon and the Bank Cases

If a rank outsider be not barred from offering a suggestion to the august and terribly in earnest body of citizens known as the League of Justice, we herewith tender one with profound respect and assurance of esteem. It is this,—that steps be taken to prevent wholesale miscarriage of justice in the cases of the men charged with having looted the California Safe Deposit and Trust Company. We realize that this is a task to try men's powers of endurance, and that might incidentally test the quality of friendship that exists between the civic patriots in the League and the tried and true political servants in the District Attorney's office, but it has our warm recommendation nevertheless. It is manifest that guilty men are getting through the meshes of the law with scandalous ease. It is evident that there is something rotten in or about our criminal courts. Where is the seat of decay? It is hardly reasonable to attribute the suspected miscarriage of justice to the monumental stupidity of District Attorney Langdon. That official is not brother to the ass in all things. In the course of his checkered political career he has exhibited the salient quality of the fox and some of the characteristics of the ant. It would be interesting to know what feelings and motives disposed him to grant J. Dalzell Brown leniency to a degree that practically amounted to immunity. Inquiry designed to elicit information with reference to the animating principle of Langdon's attitude toward Brown might produce some very good results. There ought to be some way of finding out why Brown was treated with exceptional leniency. The explanation that Brown deceived Langdon; that he promised but failed to give information which would lead to the recovery of valuable securities and facilitate the conviction of his associates, is hardly plausible. Langdon always attaches a string to his immunity contracts. There was something suspiciously facile and irregular in the handling of the Brown case. The case was rushed through with surprising celerity and Brown's word was accepted as though it were as binding as a government bond. Why was the bank looter treated with such amiable consideration? Brown, it appears, had been in the confidence and even in the affections of the cabal that directs the affairs of the District Attorney's office. It is said that he supplied this cabal with money belonging to the defrauded depositors. When arrested he employed one of the attorneys for the cabal, a man familiar with the mysterious ramifications of procedure that have been approved by Langdon. And Brown was treated like a man with friends at Court, but always ostensibly for the reason that he had volunteered to render the robbed depositors as well as the Prosecution valuable assistance. What his services to the depositors are worth the Receiver of the looted bank has told. What his services to the prosecution are worth may be judged from the acquittal of James Treadwell. As a matter of fact Brown in the role of a prosecution pet is an exhibit of great value to the defense in the bank cases. The testimony that he gives for the prosecution is of no value because the jurors understand that he is paying the price of leniency. Yet the jury in the Treadwell case has been ridiculed by the Bulletin for not finding the defendant guilty. The Bulletin being the organ of the cabal deems it advisable to mislead public opinion so that blame shall not be visited on those responsible for the maladministration of justice. And this is one of the consequences of the devious ways pursued by our District Attorney. He makes a pet of one man accused of crime and anathema of another, and it often happens that his discrimination being unwise and unjust proves advantageous to the one reserved for prosectuion. In other words, Mr. Langdon baffles justice; and to save him from being justly discredited in the eyes of the people, his sponsors and mentors inveigh against the courts, hold juries up to execration and by cunning misrepresentation seek to persuade the people that corruption is rampant and revolutionary measures are required to set the joints of the crippled times. If the League of Justice is what it purports to be; if its members are desirous of improving the administration of justice, the delinquencies of the District Attorney's office will immediately be investigated.

Ethics of the Legal Profession

In the new code of ethics of the American Bar Association the conduct of those lawyers who furnish or inspire newspaper comments concerning the cases in which they are engaged and discuss for publication the positions assumed by the respective parties and the manner in which the litigation is to be managed is condemned as a defiance of the best traditions of the legal profession and is denounced as intolerable. The chief objection to such conduct is that it tends to disqualify men for jury service. In criminal trials it is desirable to secure jurors who have not formed an opinion in reference to the guilt or innocence of the defendant. When the new code of ethics was under discussion it was said that it is the duty of every one concerned in the prosecution or defense of any case of exceptional public interest to abstain from saying anything which will tend to create a strong impression one way or the other in regard to the merits of the case in the minds of the community. This view of the matter unquestionably will be endorsed by all learned and reputable members of the legal profession. We have no hesitation in hazarding the assertion that learned and reputable members of the profession of law have never held any other view of the matter. And in this connection we will hazard the opinion that the kind of conduct which has been condemned by the American Bar Association is far more tolerable than the employment in a State university in the capacity of nurse to budding Blackstones and Kents of a lawyer who is ignorant of the ethics of his profession.

Consider the Pedagogue

At the State University across the bay there is employed a gentleman by the name of Boke. He is said to be a lawyer. He has concerned himself in the prosecution of men accused of crime. He has associated himself with a cabal instituted for the express purpose of procuring the conviction of men under indictment and he is now seeking to employ public sentiment as a first aid to justice. To that end he is trying to influence public sentiment, and he is using as the medium of his messages to the rabble a buccaneerish newspaper which is notoriously engaged in undermining public confidence in the courts, and which had the audacity not long ago to urge by innuendo the desirability of lynching the judges of the Court of Appeal. This instructor of youth has endorsed the conduct of a prosecuting attorney whose conception of the ethics of his profession justifies him in exhorting the populace to make manifest its indignation against men awaiting trial. With our emotions under perfect control we point to Boke, the man at whose feet the youth of the State seek edification, and we suggest that he be pondered. In Berkeley, where inferior eyes borrow their behavior from the great, is Boke the contemner of professional ethics teaching by example? This question we ask in all seriousness. There is nothing so important in this world as right thinking, and we believe that the Regents of the State University have no higher duty to perform than to see that the students thereof are not being trained to think in the Boke fashion. When a Berkeley professor was recently charged with drunkenness many good people were shocked. Great would be their indignation if they learned that the practice of any form of immorality was tolerated in the faculty, and yet, perhaps, it has not occurred to them that obliquity of moral perception in one number of the Berkeley faculty might result in far greater demoralization than the habitual transgression of the Decalogue by the whole faculty.

Where Are the Blowholes?

It is not necessary to accept Upton Sinclair as an authority on any subject before we condescend to weigh his testimony in any special case that he may present for our consideration. Mr. Sinclair has brought serious charges against the steel trust and the officials of the departments and bureaus of the national government vested with the responsibility of making our warships battle proof. It is possible that Mr. Sinclair is all wrong; it is also possible that Mr. Sinclair may be right. As the case now stands it is a question of veracity between the accused and the accuser. The indictment has been filed and Mr. Sinclair declares that he is ready to furnish the proof of his allegations. That is all that we can require of Mr. Sinclair at this time. When he has presented his evidence in full we shall expect the men whom he accuses to bring counter proofs showing that the plaintiff has no case against them, or we shall expect them to either plead guilty or offer mitigating circumstances in extenuation of their fault, neglect or crime. Mr. Sinclair has created a sensation among the overlords of commerce before this. He once worried the beef barons and compelled them to observe the common decencies of their trade. The charge that he exaggerated the conditions prevailing in the slaughter houses and packing houses of Chicago was but a weak answer to his general indictment that the product of these great food plants was unclean and in many instances unfit for human consumption. And while it may be urged that if he was guilty of exaggeration in his story of "The Jungle," it is safe to assume that he has exaggerated the facts in his story of the steel trust and its relations with the construction bureau of the navy department, still, if he proves that the material furnished by the trust was not up to standard or in accordance with the specifications, he has proved all that is necessary, and his "exaggerations," his rhetoric and his flamboyant comment will in nowise militate against the general validity of his accusation. But Mr. Sinclair must prove his charges. He has, in effect, not only accused the trust of the grossest of criminal frauds, but he has brought the officials of the navy department to bar upon an accusation that almost savors of high treason. If it is true that these officials accepted the armor plate made by the trust knowing it to be defective and unfit for the purpose for which it was intended, they are guilty of something worse than the crime charged against Dreyfuss. It is more heinous to send a battleship into action vulnerable to the assault of the enemy than it is to betray the secrets of that battleship's construction; it is more dastardly than to sell to a foreign foe the plans of a nation's fortifications. The American people will not believe that our ships of war are unfit for the service for which they were built until Mr. Sinclair presents proofs that cannot be denied. The American people will not condemn the officials responsible for the fighting quality of these ships until they have been convicted. But in the meantime the case is open and it is the duty of the proper authorties to order a strict and searching investigation. This the American people will demand. And those accused owe it to themselves, if innocent, to force such investigation. Charges of this character, from whatever source, are too serious to be passed over perfunctorily. Our navy is our out-bulwark against foes that would not hesitate to attack us if they were convinced that what Mr. Sinclair charges is true. And if what Mr. Sinclair has said is true the sooner we know it the sooner will we repair the defects that he has pointed out. There is not much time to be lost in attempting to save somebody from the wrath of an indignant nation. As long as there is doubt there is danger. We believe that if our navy is what we have been assured the menace of war from any quarter is a negligible quantity; but if it is not in condition to encounter any other navy on earth we may be prepared to meet trouble as soon as the fact is known to the nations whose interest it is to make war upon us.

The Preservation of the Big Trees

By Henry Ransome

The escape of the Calaveras grove of Big Trees from the recent forest fires, with the partial loss only of that historical tree, the Mother of the Forest, was a piece of rare good fortune for picturesque California. The destruction of the grove would have been an irredeemable loss to the natural wonders of the world. The most painstaking efforts on the part of the government have failed to yield any very satisfactory results in the reproduction of those wonderful trees. Nature has guarded them from slaughter by placing them in high mountain environments where difficult accessibility protected them from the early commercial vandals till their unique attractions earned them public guardianship. Had lumbermen been able to market them at a profit they would have been sacrificed long since.

The discovery of the Calaveras grove, the first Big Trees revealed to the world, was like most discoveries, a great surprise. In the spring of 1852 A. T. Dowd, a hunter, was employed by the Union Water Company of Murphy's Camp, Calaveras county, to supply the workmen engaged on the canal with fresh meat. Dowd accordingly spent most of his time wandering about the country shooting bears, deers and other big game. One day he encountered a bear and while pursuing the animal he came across an immense tree. Lost in wonder at sight of the forest giant he forgot all about the bear. On his return to camp he told the ditch diggers of the immense tree he had seen. They laughed at him and joshed him about the "big tree yarn." He offered to lead them to it, but they refused to be "tricked." The following Sunday morning Dowd left the camp on a hunting excursion as usual. In a little while he came rushing back in great excitement. "Boys," he cried, "I've just killed the biggest grizzly I ever saw in my life. Come along and help get him into camp." It being Sunday, and a day off, they rounded up several horses and followed him. The hunter led them over several ridges, along canyons and through wild thickets and pine groves until as last they all stood before the mammoth tree he had described. Then he said: "Boys, that's the big grizzly I meant. What do you think of him?" For several hours the men discussed the new wonders. That day they found one specimen 302 feet high and 30 feet in diameter. One of the men conceived the idea of stripping off the bark of this giant and taking it East for exhibition purposes. So the tree was girdled of its bark, eighteen inches thick, to a height of thirty feet, and of course died. Eventually this bark was exhibited in England and was burned in the great Crystal Palace fire. The sight of it aroused the East and Europe to the new wonder of nature discovered in California and soon the endless lines of visitors from all the quarters of the globe set in towards the Big Tree grove.

As soon as possible the California Academy of Sciences obtained illustrative specimens of the cones and foliage and sent them to Professor Gray of Cambridge and to Dr. John Torrey of Columbia, but they were lost on the way. Famous European botanists came to California to examine the new discoveries. Dr. Lindsay of England was the first to scientifically describe the trees, December 24th, 1853, and thinking it was a new genus he named it Wellingtonia gigantea, after the Duke of Wellington, then recently deceased. Subsequently a closer analysis proved them to belong to a genus already classified and named by the famous botanist Endlicher, and known as the redwood sequoia sempervirens (the Taxodium sempervirens of Lambert). The generic similarity between the Big Tree and the redwood determines them to belong to the same genus, sequoia, the flowers and cones of each being alike except in size. There is, however, one striking difference between them; the sequoia grows from seeds; the sempervirens, or redwoods, from seeds and suckers, and mainly from the latter in native forests. Notwithstanding the striking resemblance between the two species of this genus the redwood has never been found growing in the Sierra Nevada mountains.

The sequoia was named after Sequoyah, the noted Cherokee Indian chief who lived in northern Alabama and who became famous as the inventor of an alphabet of eighty-six characters, each representing a syllable, for the purpose of supplying his tribe with a written language. Sequoyah died in 1843 at the age of seventy-three years. His intellectual and inventive phenomena exalted him as far above his own people as the lofty redwoods of the Coast Range towers above other forest trees; and this coincidence suggested to Endlicher the propriety of honorably perpetuating the name of the great chief.

The Big Trees of California do not grow in one continuous belt, like the pines and firs, for instance; but in groups, some of which, as the South Grove and the Tuolumne, are forty miles apart. Generally they rise from sheltered hollows, below the tops of ridges. There are ten of these groups, and commencing in the north, with the trees first discovered, the Calaveras grove, they run as follows: The Calaveras, South Grove, Tuolumne, Merced, Mariposa, Fresno, Dinky, King's River, New King's River and Kaweah, or Tule group. The latter being scattered over low ridges and valleys, only separated by deep canyons, for over sixty miles, and having a breadth of five miles, with a vertical range of two thousand five hundred feet, perhaps might freely be called a belt. It is estimated there are 60,000 trees in this strip, averaging about twenty to the acre. The altitude of this group, like the upper timber line of the Sierras, is more or less climatic and is regulated somewhat by latitude; for while the Calaveras group are less than five thousand feet above sea level, the Grizzly Giant in the Mariposa grove, by no means the highest in location, is nearly six thousand, and those of the Tule grove over eight thousand.

Their age is a problem. It is generally conceded by botanists that the concentric rings mark their annual growth. The distance between the rings is sometimes very marked; while some do not show more than six or eight to the inch, others will give forty. The concentric rings in the stump of one of the original Big Trees in the Calaveras grove prove its annual growth to have been more than double that of others in the same group; therefore, while intimating that it was cut down in its youth, perhaps a thousand years before it had attained its full development, it is suggestive of the possibility of many eminent scientists having been misled in the approximate age of these vegetable giants. J. M. Hutchings, the well-known Yosemite Valley pioneer, had a piece of wood taken from a decumbent tree in the Mariposa grove that averaged thirty-four rings to the inch. After examining many specimens he came to the conclusion that twenty-four rings to the inch was a fair average. Suppose the diameter of the tree was twenty-five feet, measuring from the heart to the outer edge of the sap, a distance of twelve feet six inches, would give the astonishing age of 3,600 years; and if thirty feet in diameter, as many are, the age would be 4,320 years. Before the glacial period the sequoia flourished in the temperate zones of Europe, Asia and America. Geologists say that when the ice receded just two species, the redwood and the Big Tree, survived and both grew in California alone. "Barring accidents," says John Muir, "the Big Trees seem to be immortal, being exempt from all the diseases that afflict and kill other trees. No tree has ever been found that died a

The Lavender Wedlock

By Otto Julius Bierbaum

She was small and slender, with light blue eyes—the color one sometimes sees in the skies at the close of a spring day, a color that typifies much longing. And she had a gentle voice like that of a schoolgirl who quivers in fear before her teacher. Her light hair was parted in the middle and drawn smoothly over her temples. Regular were her features, clear cut and Teutonic; and her expression was spiritual in a way that is difficult to describe. It was a face that was lacking in force, but one does not take note of this shortcoming in such angel faces.

Her most wonderful trait was the way she had of opening her eyes—it bespoke a prayer to Heaven punctuated with a thousand sighs of humility. Her grandfather had summed up her character with accurate aptness. "Dear, little, stupid violet," was the term by which he addressed her until he fifteenth year; then he called her "Mlle. Violette," and finally "Mme. La Violette" when she had been married—for she herself would never have dared to marry the "young master," whom she adored, whom others admired and to whom the whole world was listening attentively.

She scarcely realized how it had all come about. Like a message of grace from Heaven it had come over her when one evening he asked her to be his wife. For answer she had cried and run out of the room into the kitchen, and there had embraced the corpulent maid, sobbing for happiness.

He had demanded her hand, and her father had found no objections, for his daughter adored this great artist who appeared as her suitor.

There was scarcely need to wait for her consent. Long before she knew him personally she had raved about him and had played all his compositions to the exclusion of all other composers. She had gazed long at his picture which appeared on the title-page, the portrait of a man from the southlands, with crisp black curls falling over his forehead, sharply curved nose, full lips and dark, glowing eyes.

Now she had become his wife; but she could scarcely accustom herself to this new station. Even on the wedding day she glanced up at him reverently, her eyes filled with the devotion of a nun.

"How wags the world with Mme. La Violette?" asked her grandfather at the wedding dinner, catching her alone for an instant.

"Oh, grandfather!" And again she wept scalding tears.

"But Violet! My dear, little, stupid violet, be sensible! You know now you are Mme. La Violette and you must realize your position. Take yourself in hand and be brave! What is the matter? You love him,-do you not?"

"Oh, tremendously!"

"Very well, then; cheer up, my violet. Don't be tearful, but take some part in the conversation. You must not spend all your time simply gazing at him. Don't shrink so, but blossom on his breast."

And then the big, dark, commanding man with the eyes of genius interrupted them.

"The little violet is still timid," pleaded her grandfather. And the genius nodded dreamily.

But in her heart echoed her grandfather's words: "Blossom on his breast!"

That she would do, embracing him tenderly like ivy clinging to the statute of a god.

At first this adoration delighted him. With silent steps his love paced the house, strewing flowers about the sacrificial altar of her god. His fount of musical creation was loosed. Every chord was rewarded with a grateful glance, every ebullition of sentiment with tender surrender. It was a journey among fragrant jasmine boughs, a clear sky overhead and balmy moss underfoot.

And he created a symphony," Violets."

From out a swaying cloud of soft tenderness he threw his harmonies to the world. And her heart was full of bliss and adoration. Her glance was directed above and she hoped to spend her whole life in an attitude of supplication.

When the symphony was completed his friends heard the work. "Far too tender, dear friend. Where is your rousing swing. What has become of your palette of tonal colors that so stirred the heart? You are degenerating into saccharine prettiness."

Everywhere the judgment was the same: "Where is the old strength? Passion is your forte. You are not composing for sentimental singing societies, so take yourself in hand, else you will turn Philistine."

And in truth this tender and perfumed music did not come from his real musical self. It was only the expression of an idyllic episode; the old spirit of daring was not in it. Then his soul began once more to be stirred by echoes of his former boldness. He banished the growing lassitude and roused himself to pursue the wild, tempestuous fantasies.

But always at his back was the rustling sound of someone hovering near.

"Rose, I beg of you, leave off your languishing ways. Don't steal about so—and this eternal gazing of yours makes me very nervous."

"Robert!"

"Please understand me; I cannot bear this everlasting tenderness. We will simply expire of love and ennui."

She started, lashed by the brutality of his words, and for the first time a look of pain appeared in her eyes.

"Do you never glow with passion. This continued melting is unbearable!"

He stormed himself out at the piano while she sat silently in a corner, listening. Then he slammed down the lid of the instrument and left the room without an adieu.

Fear clamored at her heart. The mighty chords she had heard tore her soul. But everything else disappeared when she recalled the genius of this great man.

"Blossom on his breast! Can I do more?"

He returned late, looking disheveled.

"Robert!"

"Leave me alone!"

That night she did not sleep, torn by the tortures of despair. But the next day she began again her silent adoration. The more he reveled in the innermost passion which he voiced in rushing harmonies the more she realized his greatness, his artistic manhood, and all the more she clung to him in silent, patient adoration.

He strayed farther and farther from her, until finally the thought of her was a sickening incense about him.

Several times he tried in vain to awaken her. Then he forbade her to enter his room while he played and composed. And when he grew tired of working he sought relief and relaxation—no one knew where.

She sensed the fact that his love was passing, but she was so blinded by adoration that she could not find a way to win him back. She had been created only to bloom silently at his breast, like ivy about the statue of a god. And he—he craved a woman instead of a flower.

"Is Mme. La Violette very happy?" asked her grandfather.

"Happy? Oh, tremendously so, grandfather!"

Brown's Significant Curiosity

The supposition is, I am told, that J. Dalzell Brown is "broke." Whose supposition it is I don't know; nor how much fact there is to give it body. But whatever its source or its substance, it has proved to J. Dalzell Brown a very convenient supposition, for it was accepted by District Attorney Langdon and made to serve as an extenuating circumstance when the bank manager was proposed as a witness for the State. As he is "broke," some one said, it may be assumed that he did not participate in the wrecking of the bank for his own aggrandizement. But is Brown a pauper? Over in San Quentin the notion prevails that he has a large bundle of valuable securities sequestered somewhere and inaccessible to moths, creditors and rust. At San Quentin there are men versed in the ways of striped sinners, skilled in the interpretation of the moods and predilections that are engendered behind bars, and they tell me that Brown behaves very much like a man who has something better to look forward to than the carving out of a new career. They consider it luminously significant that he has a consuming passion for the quotations of the stock and bond market, and that every day he is like an opium fiend deprived of his dope until he gets hold of a daily paper containing the prices of securities. I suggested that perhaps the old habit could not be shaken off even in jail and that the banker's curiosity respecting the financial situation remained unabated even without the stimulus of personal interest. But this hypothesis was rejected by the wise ones of the penitentiary.

Nat and Maxine

Once more Nat Goodwin assures the public that Maxine Elliott is not, and does not contemplate, suing him for divorce. The veteran comedian has been denying rumors of his divorce ever since the parting of the ways which occurred in the season of 1902. In that season Maxine Elliott started out in quest of fame and fortune on her own hook, and her husband wandered through the provinces, the solitary star of his own company. Since then Maxine Elliott's professional pathway has been bordered with roses, and her husband's with thorns. In play after play the statuesque beauty triumphed, and in play after play the foremost comedian of the American stage tasted the bitter fruit of failure. What strange pranks Fate has played in the lives of these artists of the stage! When Maxine Elliott met Nat Goodwin she was Tim Frawley's "leading lady." The critics rhapsodized on her beauty and damned her talents with faint praise. In those days Goodwin was making money hand over fist. He "borrowed" Maxine from Frawley for an Australian tour and then made her his wife. Everybody said he also made her an actress. Today she is one of the queens of the American stage. The critics have praise for her beauty as well as her artistry. She has the prestige of triumphs won in English drawing rooms. She is a money-maker for managers and a fame-maker for playwrights. While Maxine has been ascending the heights Nat Goodwin has been giving an imitation of a man on the down grade.

Nat Has Been So Busy

In the first few years of their merely professional separation Goodwin and his wife took occasion at brief intervals to show that there was no foundation for the constantly recurring rumor of a domestic split. They arranged to have their pathways cross and at the crossroads they gave public exhibitions of domestic harmony. But not of late have they met. There have not even been any post-season renewals of acquaintance. But of course the breezy little comedian has been very busy of late financing his mining schemes and trying to keep in touch with his elusive leading lady. Apparently Maxine Elliott has taken no interest in these purely commercial affairs. She is attending strictly to her art, and has been denying nothing of late except the report that she has received financial backing from J. Pierpont Morgan. The New York newspapers have been anxious to know whether Mr. Morgan was financially interested in Mrs. Goodwin's new theatrical venture. Mrs. Goodwin says they are merely friends and Mr. Morgan playfully reports that his only interest lies in the prospect of getting a free pass for the opening night.

No Double Performances for Him

Unlike most of the stars of the theatrical firmament Dave Warfield, after playing his little part on the stage, modestly hides his light under a bushel. The average "eminent actor-r" as well as the average footlight divinity is as fond of acting off the stage as on, and it is the exceptional one that does not give the firstnighter a treat in some fashionable cafe after the show. Not so David Warfield. Last Monday night after he had deluged the Alcazar with the tears of a large and sympathetic audience there was a great rush for Tait's where the stars of the stage love to twinkle, and where the music master as a matter of course was expected to resume his performance. But expectations were sadly disappointed. After the show the Belasco star took to the shadows, wended his way to Fillmore street to an obscure oyster house and entered one of the box stalls in the seclusion of which he supped like an ordinary mortal.

Mrs. Hix—"I don't take any stock in these faith cures brought about by the laying on of hands."

Mrs. Dix—"Well, I do; I cured my little boy of the cigarette habit that way."

Sullivan Turned Down

The turning down of Frank J. Sullivan in the Stockton convention was a great surprise to that gentleman's friends and occasioned much indignation. Up to the very moment the vote was taken Sullivan's friends were confident of victory and so great was their rage at the outcome that in impassioned language they discussed the advisability of opposing the confirmation of Mr. Sullivan's opponent. They now assert that Mr. Sullivan received very shabby treatment and they are at a loss to account for the action that was taken since, as they point out, his brother-in-law, the Hon. James D. Phelan, had so much influence in the convention that he had no difficulty in having himself chosen as elector-at-large. But there are some very shrewd politicians who say they understand perfectly why Mr. Sullivan was not nominated. They are of the opinion that Mr. Phelan understands also. According to the wise ones Mr. Sullivan has been ill requited for his self-sacrificing devotion through many years to the political interests of his ambitious relative.

Kerr Rebuked

What a vast difference there is between the Bar Association of San Francisco and the Bar Association of Los Angeles! It is painful to some of us to realize that we must look to Los Angeles for edifying example, but every little while there occurs something to make this realization impossible of evasion. The San Francisco Bar Association, dominated by a lot of small-fry, narrow-gauged attorneys, bursting with envy, has viewed with complaisance all the scandals that have been brought upon the administration of justice by the venemous demagogues and congenital soreheads of the profession. Apparently there is not enough manhood in the whole Bar Association to protest against the howling charlantism of the Bokes, the Heneys, the Dunnes and the Kerrs. Encouraged by the indifference of the Bar Association these blatant ones have presumed to go as far as they liked, but at length a halt has been called. From Los Angeles comes the news that the gratuitous insult thrown at the Supreme Court by J. W. Kerr in his annotations to the code has excited the indignation of the Bar Association of that city. As lawyers know, upon no conceivable hypothesis can Kerr justify his presumption in working into his annotations animadversions on a decision of the Supreme Court. Aside from the execrable taste exhibited by Kerr in setting himself up as an oracle of the law, as a man more learned than all the members of the Supreme Court, he was guilty of a serious breach of the proprieties. And for that he has been rebuked by the Bar Association of Los Angeles, and the work which he has annotated has been condemned. In this connection it is worth while observing that in the bar of Los Angeles are some of the most brilliant and distinguished lawyers in California. Among them are the members of the firms of O'Melveney, Stevens & Milliken, Gibson, Trask, Dunn & Crutcher, and Shankland & Shandler, Henry T. Gage, R. F. Del Valle, E. W. Britt, Walter J. Trask, John W. Mitchell, Wheaton A. Gray and Isidor B Dockweiler.

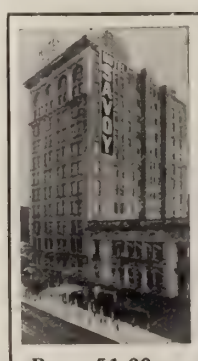
The Turn of the Mask

Mrs. Paul Neumann's leap into the sea from a Panama liner this week, while suffering from tropic fevers, is a sombre ending of the name of the man who, while he lived here, was the leading spirit in the golden merry-making era of the Bohemian Club. Neumann's family ties, as he often explained, were too puzzling to elucidate as a joke. He was a Jew by faith, but he did not live up to the tenets of his religion. His wife was Spanish and a devout Catholic. It was to settle up her step-father's estate that she made the recent trip to Acapulco, where the fevers fastened their grip on her. Neumann was also a staunch Mason and was buried by that order. In his day, around 1880, he was generally regarded as the maddest, merriest wag of the most care-free bohemians. Light hearted, fun loving King Kalakaua took such a strong liking to him that he made him attorney-general of Hawaii. Neumann gradually acquired a great deal of power in the little kingdom and accumulated a large estate. After the annexation he represented Queen Liliokulani at Washington and pressed her claims to the crown lands. He was credited with knowing more about the laws of Hawaii than any other man living.

How He Defeated the Opposition

In the annals of the Bohemian Club his name stands out in capitals. He was one of its earliest and most devoted members and in his day he furnished the motif of many of the club's best jokes and stories. He was its president in 1880, a period when he was also State Senator. His ultra bohemian methods led to strong opposition from conservative members. In one of the contests Mr. Josselyn, a determined and aggressive member, succeeded in stalling all Neumann's club measures for several months. Finally, one night when the session had been particularly long and the room was warm, Mr. Josselyn fell asleep, whereupon Mr. Neumann, noticing the fact, quietly called up the first of the obnoxious measures and declaring that it would be a pity to awaken his dear friend Josselyn, cast his vote for him in the affirmative. He then brought up in succession all of the other contested points, and voted Josselyn "aye" on each of them, with such success that when that gentleman was aroused at the adjournment he found that all of the measures that he had opposed were passed, and that he was on record in favor of them. Nor would the board's sense of humor permit, when Mr. Josselyn demanded it, a reconsideration.

His Intimacy with King Kalakaua



Neumann was an inveterate poker player and when he became the power behind the throne under King Kalakaua, cards became the reference books in most of the "cabinet councils" in which they were supposed to be often closeted. On one occasion the two were deep in the chips of a game when the telephone rang vigorously and an attendant summoned the king. While Kalakaua was absent Neumann figured out that the royal sport was in his debt several thousand dollars. While calculating the chances of collecting the debt the king returned, apparently very much upset. "Paul," he said, gravely, "there's a wild street brawl going on down town and it's likely to develop into a political revolution unless it is stamped out immediately. I must drop this game, get to my office, summon the heads of police, and have them suppress this outbreak." "One moment," said Neumann, just as gravely, as he stacked up the chips with great precision, "I have just figured out that you owe me $5,080. I give you timely warning that there will be a far more dangerous revolution started here instantly unless some sort of settlement is made at once." The king smiled. Then he sat down and wrote his I. O. U's for the amount and the threatened poker revolution went over till their next meeting.

"He's very sanguine."
"Always hopes for the best, eh?"
"Why, he really seems to expect it."

A Stormy Matrimonial Sea

The Dunphy family has been an inexhaustible mine of story material for the gossips and the press for a decade past. Tea parties have been given extra sessions and the newspapers extra columns through the eccentricities of the "cattle king," the settlement of the big estate, the Dunphy-Piercy marriage, the lively contest over the guardianship of their daughter Viola, the strange sleep of Alida Wilbur during her engagement to a Dunphy, the whims of Mrs. Dunphy, in distributing the family allowance to her children, the mystery surrounding the much-discussed engagement of Miss Jennie Dunphy and Bob Grayson, and the marital pranks of Bluff Jim Dunphy himself. Jimmy's ventures into matrimony have furnished a deal of material for the gossips and have occupied the serious attention of his family as well as the courts. His first marriage many years ago was an elopement; I belive it was a San Rafael justice who tied the knot. Dunphy, the cattle king, was a great stickler for the religious proprieties, and being a strict Catholic he had the ceremony performed in the church. But this proceeding did not seem to bother the errant swain. On his next essay into matrimony, some five years ago, he defied home prejudices with his old-time unconcern by getting married by a Justice of the Peace again. The infelicity of this alliance, with the story of the wife's ill-treatment, has just been aired in the local courts. This marriage aroused the indignation of Dunphy's mother, who controlled the financial purse of the family, and for a time the matrimonial path was rather dusty for the newly wedded pair. She flatly refused to see the new made wife. Dunphy, Sr., never had any confidence in the financial ability of his son, and he disposed of his estate in a way that barred Jimmie from any hand in its management. For a long while he was dependent on his mother for an allowance. Those who know his ways are not at all surprised that his estate is now reduced to $200,000 under his management. When he pays his ex-wife the $60,000 awarded her by the court in the recent divorce proceedings he will be reduced to a very ordinary income, something approaching impecuniosity to a free spender like Jimmie.

Family Ghosts

Mrs. Dunphy, the mother, led a very lonely life after the death of her millionaire husband. Her beautiful daughter, Miss Jennie Dunphy, was a shining member of society, but Mrs. Dunphy barred the doors of her big mansion and refused to see any callers. Her meals were sent to her room and the only times the servants caught sight of her was when she appeared to direct or to join in the housework. By the terms of her husband's will her children were all dependent on her whims for their allowances. When her granddaughter, Viola Piercy, picked out her own husband, James Burnett, and married him to suit herself solely the young couple suffered in great anxiety for a long while lest they had offended the old lady in their haste. The marriage of Mrs. Flood, the elder Dunphy daughter, was very unhappy and ended in a divorce, and the marriage of another daughter to Sam Piercy was bitterly opposed by the family. This feeling was intensified after the parents' deaths, by the long and stubborn contest over the guardianship of their daughter Viola. Then came the matter of the much rumored engagement of Miss Jennie Dunphy to Bob Grayson. First the marriage was pronounced impossible because he was not a Catholic. Then he became a Catholic and another objection arose, ghostlike, out of the affair, and in the midst of the mystery Bob Grayson died, suddenly and alone and added another to the everlasting stories surrounding the Dunphy family.

Lost Many Treasures

One of the show places in Piedmont, the beautiful and sumptuous house of the Harry Bishops, was destroyed by fire last week. The loss is irreparable for Mr. Bishop had collected art treasures and curios from all parts of the world. There was not a spot he had visited in his extensive travels but what was represented by some rich memento either within the house or on the broad veranda. Many of his most valuable theatrical treasures were kept there. Mr. Bishop had been zealously adding to this collection for a long time past; the nucleus was laid by his father in the famous old Grand Opera House in this city. The Piedmont mansion cost sixty thousand dollars; not a tithe of it was insured. Mr. and Mrs. Bishop and their three children and a brother-in-law and a sister-in-law are temporarily stopping at the Key Route Inn, pending the erection of a more elaborate house on the same site.

Death of a Gallant Officer

Rear-Admiral Henry Glass, whose death occurred this week was a man of many fine traits of character. In the circle of his friends he was much beloved. As an officer he lived up to the very best traditions of the navy. For administrative ability he was unsurpassed. He was a great enthusiast in all matters pertaining to the welfare of the service, and he was a stickler for discipline, demanding at all times the highest efficiency in the handling of ships and in every department under his supervision. During his long career on this Coast he acquired a vast knowledge of conditions in the Pacific which proved very useful to the authorities at Washington whose confidence the gallant sea fighter always enjoyed. It was characteristic of Admiral Glass that he should desire to be buried without military pomp, and consequently the funeral services were as simple as they were impressive.

Looking for a Millionaire

Isadora Duncan, who has just arrived in New York to dance in this country under Frohman's management, said in a recent interview: "I am devoted to my dancing and I love the little children of my school, but I am anxious to get somebody to take the financial end off my shoulders. A millionaire will do, or a municipality, or an institution. My trip to the United States will be principally with the object of arousing an interest in Grecian dancing in the hopes that some one will come forward with the money. In my first year in Berlin I made $30,000 clear from my dancing and with that money I started my school for children. Since then I have had to find $10,000 every year for its maintenance besides giving my services to the instruction of the girls and the management of the institution. I am perfectly willing to continue giving my services, but I do wish that some one would come forward and relieve me of the necessity of finding the money as well. I have never danced in public in the United States, but always privately. I had the pleasure at that time of almost starving to death, not only here, but in London eight years ago."

Alphabetical Greeks

The Pan Hellenes of Berkeley are a gregarious tribe hitherto cliquing by natural selection, which is deemed bad Greek form by the areopagites who have decreed that hereafter the sororities from Alpha to Omega shall assemble unanimously on the last Tuesday of every month in three of the "coed fraternities" for the purpose of "holding open house." It is mostly Greek to me, and if I am not in gross error regarding the special requirements of these Berkeley Greeks it is Greek to them beyond the letters of the Greek alphabet that symbolize their sisterhood societies. What is a Pan Hellene, anyway? What is the essential difference between a Pi Beta Phi and a Gamma Phi Beta? Wherein is a member of the Alpha Omicron Pi of superior or inferior caste to a Kappa Kappa Gamma or a Delta Delta Delta? Perhaps it wouldn't seem so absurd if I were a Pan Hellenic myself; but in the meantime the Pi's, Phi's, Chi's and the Gammas amuse me while the Betas, Deltas and Omicrons are as symposiacal humor or Attic nights after the unnumbered supernaculum.

Co-Ed Revenge

Miss Isabel McReynolds, who achieved considerable publicity a year or two ago, while a student at the University of California, has a book on Philosophy ready for the press. While at Berkeley Miss McReynolds' name was withdrawn from the Greek letter sorority to which she belonged "for good and sufficient reasons." She was not given an opportunity to defend herself, in fact, was given no more inkling of the specific facts than the general public. Instances of this sort are so rare in the college world that the affair attracted more than local interest. Champions of Miss McReynolds hurled anathemas at the "narrow, cruel set of girls who could do such an ungentlemanly thing." Through it all Miss McReynolds preserved a beautiful calm, which did not communicate itself to her friends. She seemed to merely regard herself as a member of a syndicate holding a certain number of shares in an unfortunate scandal in which the sorority really held the majority of the stock. It was a sane and sober viewpoint, justified by the events which followed, during which the action of the sorority was held up to public and private shame and ridicule. All over the United States there is stirring a strong "anti-frat" movement and I have frequently seen this case pointed out as an instance of the blight of such secret organizations.

Bound to Stir Berkeley

The placid irony with which Miss McReynolds viewed the affair may now be analyzed. She was planning a subtle revenge! It was all just so much data for the book which she would some day write. Those who know Miss McReynolds best predict that her so-called philosophy will be interesting reading, though not pure philosophy as defined by Professor Howison of Berkeley. It is not apt to follow line and rule—a paradox may even elope with a syllogism—but it is bound to be vibrant with statements which the average sorority girl will read with dainty disfavor. The Berkeley pickle is apt to be pretty well washed off her viewpoint and while the general public may chuckle over the pages there will be no answering echo to the chuckle in the classic confines of the college town.

Sisterhoods of Social Science

I hope that the two young ladies who are educating themselves in Social Science at the State University will not accuse me of trying to convict them of frivoling their precious hours in social diversion. I don't know anything about it personally. All my knowledge concerning their "activities" in and around the porticoes and vestibules of learning is derived from the daily newspapers and my reading of the requirements of the Social Science department of the University which, I understand is the "course" most affected by the feminine contingent of the State's highest school. Not that I am censoriously critical of the Social Science curriculum of the State University; on the contrary, I am of the opinion that it is a very nice feminine "course" and one that eminently fits the young ladies who are "taking it" for every duty that they will have to perform after they are married, settled and absorbed in homes partially peopled by husbands who never went to college. But I would like to know something more regarding these Greek letter sororities. What is their definite purpose? And how much Greek do they impose upon their membership aside from the sporadic letters of the alphabet? If I am to believe what I read in the daily newspapers there are not enough letters in the Greek alphabet to designate all the sororities and it is necessary to double up on many of them. Still basing my surmises on the unstable and untrustworthy records of the daily prints I am forced to the inference that the co-educational section of the State University is chiefly engaged in the effort to join a sorority, in the effort to get somebody to join a sorority, or in the effort to prevent somebody from joining a sorority. I heard the other day that it was necessary to enact a Draconian statute to the effect that freshgirls should not be "rushed" until after they had been bidden to tiffin at every sorority of the alphabet. From this I deduced that the tea tables were spread from lunch time until bedtime and that mere books and classes were the exception to prove the rule of a somewhat expensive faculty. I am glad, however, that the woman of the future is not a genuine Greek. A little learning is a dangerous thing especially in young women; and I would be very much disheartened if it should be revealed to me that the Pan Hellenics of Berkeley were advancing beyond the small Latin to the Social Science department.

in the street car is an old-fashioned Democrat, a Kentuckian by buth, suh; or a Georgian raised, by gad. I am not surprised, therefore, that the Democratic platform in this State contains a clause pledging Democratic candidates for the legislature to vote for the equal suffrage amendment. It is not sufficient for me that carping cynics impugn the motives of the Democratic convention by declaring that the suffrage plank was inserted in the Democratic platform because it had been rejected by the Republican convention. Neither am I convinced that the Democrats were unable to resist the blandishments of the sweet and winsome creatures who appealed to them for their political rights. I believe that these Democrats were actuated by native and acquired gallantry. The courtesy of a suffrage plank in a Democratic platform was little to give, to be sure; but even if it had involved more than courtesy I am sure that it would have been granted with as little hesitation as was this small favor. I respect a true gentleman wherever I find him, and I am more than gratified to find so many real gentlemen in a Democratic convention.

Why They Are Democrats

Now that the ladies have received their gift at the hands of the Democratic convention, what are they going to do with it? Will they get out and stump for the simple old Jeffersonians. Will they toss their tempestuous petticoats in the hurly-burly of a hot and dusty campaign? I hope so; for gratitude is a virtue that befits a woman as it does a man, and is not puffed up nor given to arrogance of demeanor. I know that the suffragettes will do all that lies in their power to elect the legislative candidates of the Democracy, not wholly because those candidates are pledged to vote for the equal suffrage amendment but rather as a guarantee of their good faith in the motives that prompted the Democratic convention to silver platter the ballot to the women of California, as many as may desire to "cast" it. And suppose that by the aid of the vote-craving women a majority of the Democratic candidates shall be elected—what then? Why, the amendment, of couse. And after that? Why, more tempestuous petticoats, to be sure—mostly in the parlors and reception rooms of the women whose men folk will vote. And still guessing, suppose the amendment is carried by the necessary two-thirds vote of the tempest-tossed, petticoat-ruled electors—what then? Will these feminine politicians still remain true to their political love? Will they vote the Democratic ticket for better or worse? Will those who are married to Republican husbands forsake the political faith of their late lords and masters to kneel at the shrines of the strange gods of Democracy? Woman, the poet says, was ever fickle, uncertain, coy, and hard to please. Still, as another, not a poet, hath it, you never know what a woman will do until after she has done it.

Nervous Wife—"Oh, doctor, if an operation is necessary we want you to operate immediately! Expense is no object."

A "Rat-Hole" Fund

What an easy mark is the San Francisco taxpayer! No rube of the cow district, no jay of Milpitas precinct, upstarting at the riveters under the mortgaged eaves of the Phelan building, is easier. But of all the bunko steers that are planned and executed to filch dollars from the pockets of the gullible and helpless populace, the most brazen is probably that which puts the money into the purse of Detective Burns and his bunch of "assistant special agents." There are twenty-three of these who defy the latent hoodoo of the unlucky numeral. To maintain these sleuths an appropriation of $70,000 has been made, and it is as certain as death or taxes that the entire appropriation will be expended. Burns himself gets $625 a month from this fund and his son, George E. Burns, a callow youth, gets $125 a month; to which is added any "expenses" father and son may see fit to charge. The other "agents" receive whatever they are worth according to a carefully graduated scale arranged in the office of the District Attorney. What these people are doing for the money nobody seems to know, but it has been charged that most of them are doing nothing and performing their duty in this respect with neatness and despatch. The proverbial "rat-hole" is a crevice in a safe-deposit vault compared with this Burns crater—the daughters of the horse-leech are not more insatiate. But what does it matter?—the city is rich and the disbursing officials don't care. Only the poor, hag-ridden taxpayer protests; and that protest is as a low, sad moan in Hades. There is no hope for the taxpayer. He has committed the unpardonable sin of boobery—his aggregate name is Mutt and he has convicted himself of picking his own pockets.

He—"Have you made up your mind to stay in?"
She—"No, I have made up my face to go out."

Will Make Her Theatrical Debut

When the new Valencia Theatre opens next Monday evening, a great many local club women will be much surprised to see Mrs. J. M. Gambel in the cast under the stage name of "Peggie Munroe." For some time past Mrs. Gambel has been one of the attractive drawing cards at the reading entertainments given by the Sorosis, the Century and the California clubs in this city. In these social gatherings she has won for herself a certain enviable distinction as a clever reciter. Her success became so flattering that it fired her ambition to achieve a similar distinction on the stage. In the organization of the new Valencia theatre company her husband, Mr.

Truth and Fiction

An editorial writer of the Hearst staff tells us that in one of the best of recent detective stories the climax comes when the great detective employed on the case is shown to have been a notorious criminal. This, according to Mr. Hearst's expert in fiction, is an ingenious way of giving the reader a shock, but it is too violent a twist from probability. It would be interesting to know where the man who holds this view has been sequestered. Surely he does not read the newspapers. Perhaps he reads only fiction and is ignorant of the fact that imagination cannot conceive things more wonderful than those which are happening every day. But there is nothing wonderful in the circumstance of a great rascal being employed as a detective. The combination of rogue and detective is commonplace. The wolf in sheep's clothing has been preying upon society since the glacial period. The rara avis that is gradually becoming an extinct species is the gumshoe artist who would scruple at wrongdoing. By the way, it is somewhat curious to find an Examiner editorial writer condemning a story because of the improbability involved in such a climax as the one described. Many years ago there was employed on the Examiner an editorial writer who figured in a climax of exactly the same nature. Before coming to this city he was employed in New Orleans, where he discovered that the chief of detectives was associated with a gang of safe-blowers. He exposed the detective and in a quarrel that ensued the detective was killed.

New Job for "A Darling of the Gods"

Friends of Blanche Bates have been hoping that she would find time to run out here this summer so they have been polishing up a welcome home for her. Her appearance in Belasco's new play at the Stuyvesant theatre, New York, has definitely settled the matter. She has been taking a private course with a business college teacher. This does not mean that Blanche has developed an overblown talent for business and has decided to forsake the footlights for a high stool in the padded office of a railway director. Nor does it mean that she is taking a course in bookkeeping to enable her to accurately figure out the profit and loss of a tiff with Belasco. As a matter of sheer fact Miss Bates is clicking the typewriter in the cause of realism. In the new play in which she appears she essays the role of a stenographer and modern stagecraft demands that she be "on to her job." As a result her friends out here have been receiving rmarkable letters—sort of "practice on the canine first" epistles. One which I read began, "Since I must put in a certain number of hours on this infernal machine I might as well write to you. Oh, curses! There goes the little bell before I was ready."

About Prominent People

James B. Connolly is contributing to Scribner's Magazine a novel with the title "An Olympic Victor." Mr. Connolly is an Olympic victor himself, having been one of the successful competitors in 1893. President Roosevelt has recently nominated him as the ideal of an all-round man, and if variety of experience counts, he has earned the title. J. B. Connolly is a Harvard graduate, the son of a Gloucester skipper, and he has learned at first hand something of the adventures which he credits to his "Wesley Mars," "Tommy Ohlsen," and other sail-carriers, in his stirring tales of the North Atlantic fishermen, for he has made voyages to the Grand Banks, fished with the Lapps of Vardoe, the Finns of Hammerfest, and the North Sea and Baltic venturers. He has punched steers on a cattle boat, hunted whales, and acted as dredge inspector in the government work at Tybee Knoll, an experience which he embodied in one of the best books ever written for real boys. He made a voyage as passenger in the Fleur de Lys, the smallest of the yachts which competed in the German Emperor's Trans-Atlantic cup race, in which event Captain Bohlin, who is the prototype of his "Tommy Ohlsen," was the navigator. He has had a bit of experience as both soldier and sailor, for he fought through the Santiago campaign in the Spanish war, and somewhat more than a year ago he enlisted in the navy with the design of learning the life from the inside for literary purposes. This design was defeated when the men discovered his identity, and he withdrew, but he accompanied the fleet from Hampton Roads to Southern California as correspondent.

End of the Local Harness Trust

The personal petition filed this week by Albert G. Stoll, president of the United Harness Company, to become a bankrupt puts a quietus to the death rattles of that long suffering corporation. Thus perishes Stoll's original idea of cornering all the leading harness shops on the Pacific Coast and establishing a trust that would coin money for the original subscribers. Now it lies buried under a deficit of nearly a half million dollars. Stoli stood well in the graces of several large harness firms on the Coast when he conceived his idea, notably with Frank Winchester and the Home Company, and he baited his sparkling arguments with such alluring profits that the most conservative among them became eager subscribers to the scheme. For a time before the big fire it certainly looked as though a harvest of dollars would be garnered, but Stoll's enthusiasm to gather into the fold every harness shop in sight ran away with him, or else his business sense lagged with overwork. At any rate, he began to pay extravagant prices for shops that if left to themselves never could have cut into the business of the trust. As time passed the agents in these outside shops, thinking that business would be forced to the doors of the trust, became careless in drumming up trade, and soon things were going to pot. The Stones and the Winchesters, who had been drawn into the scheme rather heavily, came to the corporation's financial relief several times in the hope of saving the sinking ship. As a last effort Frank Winchester furnished $75,000 of his personal fortune shortly after the big fire. The only showing made in the affair by this small fortune was the flash in which it disappeared. The assets show only $7,905. It is said to be the worst wrecked trust that ever went to pieces on the Pacific Coast.

Mutt and Mentor

Colonel Mutt—This is outrageous!

Major Mentor—What's on your nerves now, Colonel?

Colonel Mutt—This bribery scandal in the Ruef case. It makes a man's blood boil to read of these crimes against justice. Aren't you indignant?

Major Mentor—Not a bit.

Colonel Mutt—Don't you believe somebody has been trying to bribe jurors for Ruef?

Major Mentor—I'm sure of it.

Colonel Mutt—Well, isn't it outrageous?

Major Mentor—To be sure it is. It is infamous. It was bad enough for Ruef to be a grafter, but what shall be said of the sins of those who have afforded him justification for adding bribery or almost any old thing to his other crimes?

Colonel Mutt—I don't understand you.

Major Mentor—That's probably because I'm so easily understood. But I'll cloud my meaning a little so that you'll have no difficulty. As the parables of the Bible demonstrate nothing is so intelligible as that which is obscure. To illustrate: Once upon a time two young men signed to fight a duel in strict accordance with the Code of Honor. One began shooting before the signal was given. "You're no gentleman," said the other, "but I cannot afford to vindicate the superiority of my morals and my manners." Thereupon he stretched himself flat on the grass, took aim on his elbow and shot the other fellow through the heart. See the application?

Colonel Mutt—No; I don't understand enigmas.

Major Mentor—To some men the obvious is as cryptical as the riddle that stumped the Thebans. However, I'll try again. In the Ruef case the rules of the game have been entirely abandoned. This, I may say parenthetically, is the natural consequence of the methods that have been pursued by the Graft Prosecution. Through intrigue resorted to on the theory that the end justifies the means, they got themselves into a hole and now to get out they'd stand on their own necks if that were possible. At first they perverted the law, now they are acting in defiance of all law. But though Ruef is a very great rogue he is guaranteed a trial under certain well defined rules. There is a code for criminal trials as well as for duels. No matter what crimes a man may have committed nobody has the right arbitrarily to alter the rules for his trial. Nevertheless the rules have been altered to enable the Prosecution to regain the ground they lost while intriguing.

Colonel Mutt—Who altered them?

Major Mentor—Among others Judge Lawlor. He announced from the bench that prevailing conditions justified the Prosecution in tampering with prospective jurors. Besides we know that the disqualification of a juror was adjudged by him on the testimony of a private detective.

Colonel Mutt—That's his privilege.

Major Mentor—Indeed it is; but it's a pretty tough privilege for a judge to avail himself of. It's pretty tough for a judge to be driven to the necessity of preferring the word of a private detective to that of a citizen whose character must have been deemed good by some member of the judiciary or else his name would not have appeared in the box. The courts of the country hitherto have classed private detectives with prostitutes in determining the measure of credence that should be given to their testimony. In the Ruef case the private detective is exalted above the average citizen. Can you guess the reason?

Colonel Mutt—No; what is the reason?

Major Mentor—Well, of course I can do no more than guess. I cannot lay bare the mind and heart of the court. Knowing, however, that when there is a conflict of evidence respecting the qualifications of a juror it is within the discretion of the court to dismiss or accept the juror I am almost constrained to jump to a conclusion as to why a handy private detective is proving so important a person in the Ruef case.

Colonel Mutt—Do you mean to insinuate that the court is packing the jury?

Major Mentor—Far be it from me to utter invidious insinuations. I have not been taken into the confidence of the court. All that I know is what everybody knows,—that if a private detective who can't remember anything save just what is sufficient to produce a conflict of evidence is to be believed in preference to the average citizen the Prosecution will be able to pack the jury box with men as incapable of rendering an honest verdict as twelve jurors with Ruef's money jingling in their pockets.

Colonel Mutt—Do you believe the Prosecution would do such a thing?

Major Mentor—As I believe the Prosecution has done much worse I have no difficulty in bringing myself to the belief that packing a jury is quite within the scope of its infernalities.

Colonel Mutt—But no matter what your opinion of the Prosecution is it shouldn't cause you to assume an attitude of forbearance toward Ruef.

Major Mentor—Nor does it. But it does compel me to justify anything Ruef does to get free. Believing that he is being tried outside the law and in defiance of law, I think he would be a fool to overlook an opportunity of circumventing the men who have conspired to railroad him to the penitentiary. This may strike you and Professor Boke as a heterodox view, but in my philosophy it is a logical view. In revolutionary times revolutionary measures are justifiable. Even Judge Lawlor has enunciated that view from the bench. And he cannot dodge the logical sequence. He has no more right than Ruef has to suspend the laws of his country; nor as much incentive, for Ruef has the law of self-preservation to influence his conduct. But as the bars are down I shall be surprised if Ruef doesn't go further and get a private detective to produce a conflict of testimony with reference to the qualifications of jurors that suit Mr. Heney. It will probably avail him not, but at least it will tend to heighten the farcical aspect of the proceedings.

Colonel Mutt—You astonish me.

Major Mentor—I thought so. And Boke too, in all probability. I strike you as being somewhat anarchic, but Colonel, we are all anarchic these days. We haven't been law abiding since the day we hearkened to the serpent in the guise of a dashing young civic patriot.

"Why do women enjoy weeping at a matinee," said he.
"I don't know," answered she. "Why do men enjoy getting angry at the umpire?"

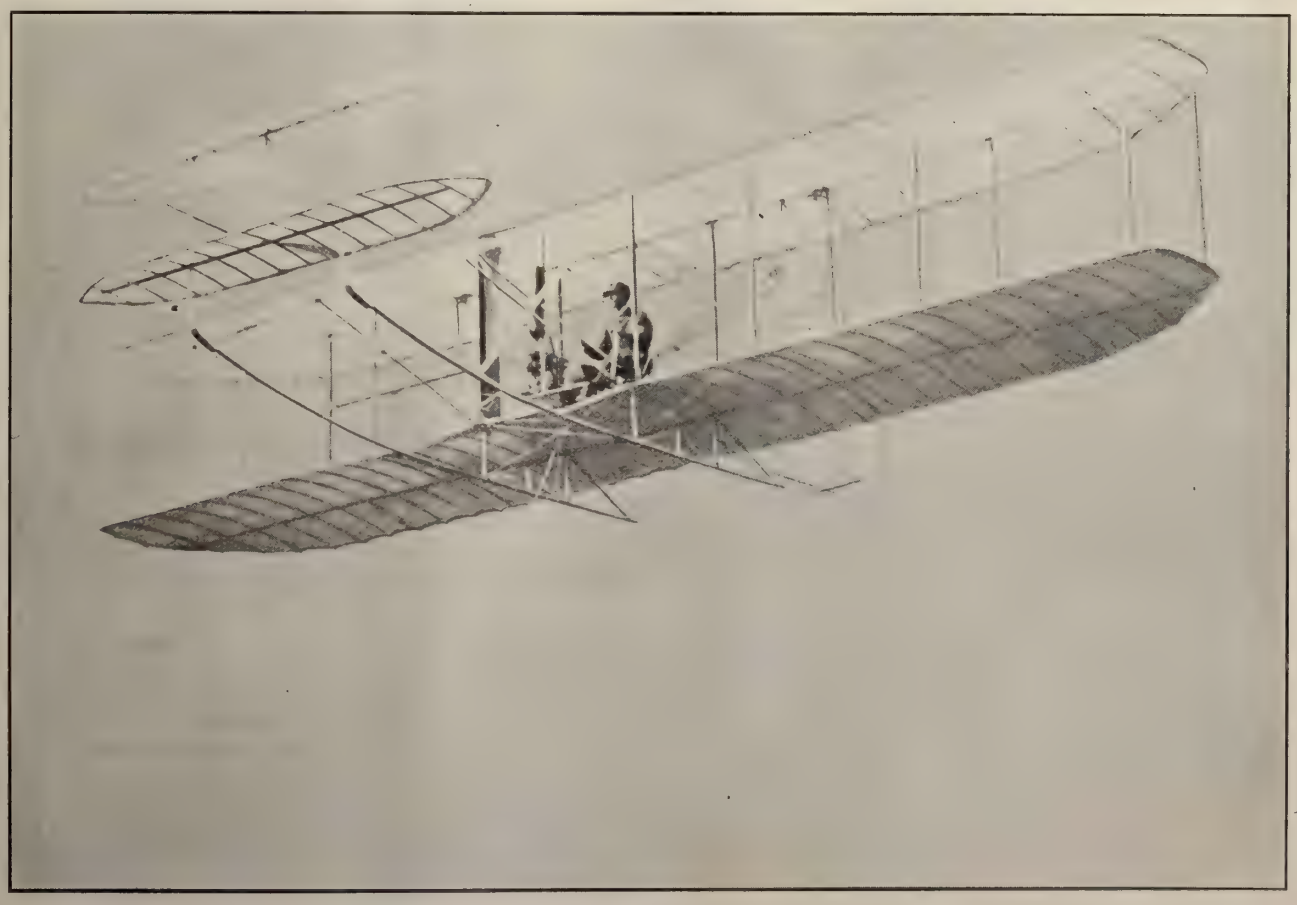
To Campaign Round the Circle



Way for the "Red Special!" The local Socialists are preparing to receive it with unrestrained enthusiasm for it bears their Presidential candidate, Eugene V. Debs, Ben Hanford, candidate for Vice-President, A. M. Simons, editor of the Chicago Daily Socialist, twenty tons of campaign literature, besides a robust and tempetuous brass band. The local socialist leaders are going to meet the train as it enters the southern part of the State and help the imported spellbinders to scatter socialistic seed as the "Red Special" winds its way through the main towns in the centre of California and disappears in the direction of Seattle and the north. The train is scheduled to leave Chicago this month, swing around the Pacific Coast circuit, traverse the northern States and reach the eastern field and New York during the last days of the campaign. For this ocean to ocean whirl of the "Red Special" $20,000 was required. Contributions ranging from five cents to $200 came pouring in from fifteen thousand subscribers and $10,000 was raised in less than a month, enough to more than cover the expense of the first leg of the journey, which is to San Francisco.

Tait and His Projects

The Japs may have designs on Van Ness avenue, but they cannot drive John Tait out of his cafe. It was reported in one of the dailies last week that the most famous of the post-fire cafes was to be abandoned and that the Sherry of the West, having bought out a wholesale liquor business, was about to quit catering to fashionable appetites. This report, I have ascertained, is somewhat inaccurate. Tait is about to conquest new realms, but he is not immediately to abandon the Van Ness cafe. Nor is he to abandon the restaurant business at all. He has leased a piece of property on O'Farrell street in the neighborhood of the old Alcazar, and there he will erect a building in which he will open a cafe early next year. As for the Cliff House project which is of grave public interest, that has begun to shape itself quite satisfactorily to all concerned. Architects are now at work on the plans, and if expectations are realized we may renew acquaintance with the seals from the porch of Cliff House No. 3 in March, 1909.

Aritstic Residence for Sale

As will be seen by the advertisement on page 14 of this issue, the beautiful residence of Mr. R. G. Hanford, on the southwest corner of Vallejo and Taylor streets, is offered for sale. This is an unusual opportunity for a person desiring a high-class residence. Mr. Hanford spared no pains in building this artistic house, intended for his home, but his business prevents his continual residence in the city and he has decided to dispose of his holding at a low figure. The location is in one of our best neighborhoods and is ideal; in addition it possesses an unsurpassed marine view.

WILLIAM WRIGHT MAKING HIS RECENT GREAT FLIGHT IN HIS AEROPLANE, NEAR PARIS.

The machine was in the air for nineteen minutes, 48 2-5 seconds, thus approaching within a fraction of a minute of Henry Farman's record for the longest public official flight. The distance covered by Wright was not accurately measured, but it is estimated at between 14 1-2 and 15 miles. The feat was accomplished on the field of Auvours and was accompanied by a remarkable series of evolutions demonstrating the precision of Wright's control of the machine. When he alighted easily within 300 feet of his starting place, the American aeroplanist was overwhelmed with congratulations.

By R. E. Mulcahy

The reaction in Wall Street security values, which has been expected by the public, has up to date failed to materialize, much to the disgust of those who have allowed many good opportunities to pass by them. In the general run of events a good decline has been overdue for some time. Present indications do not point very strongly to any material reaction in prices for some time to come. Stocks and bonds are now owned by those who had the money to pick them up last November and December; their purchases are not only upon a speculative footing but may be construed upon an investment basis, and have allowed these holders to add to their lines as the market advanced; money being cheap has added to their position with more than ordinary security. The Harriman issues continue to lead in the advance, Southern Pacific Common selling at 110 and Union Pacific Common at 167½; the advance in these securities has added to the long list of friends gathered around the Harriman groups. Harriman certainly deserves great credit. The same may be said of the possibilities surrounding the territory through which his system traverses. If the country was not there to develop he would not have met with such great success. Harriman took hold of his properties at an opportune time. He is a man who deals in the future; so was Jay Cook and Henry Villard; these gentlemen happened to be ahead of time, one twenty years, the other ten; Harriman's wisdom out-generaled theirs from the point of view of the opportunity. There are yet great opportunities to be had on this Coast, but it seems to take an outsider to fathom them and get their benefits. At no distant date one or more of the railway systems out here will develop new territory by electric transportation; this will build up the interior and give life to the cities. No doubt those who control Southern Pacific, Atchison, Union Pacific and other transcontinental lines have this proposition under way at the present time. Railways do not live on through traffic; they must have local revenue. The next five years will see wonderful developments in this direction. There are many good reasons for the advance in Southern Pacific. It is not unlikely the future has had as much to do with it as rumors of an increase in its dividend. Many conservative eastern bankers are disposed to think well of Atchison securities and a good advance in them would not be surprising. There has been a good brisk demand for Western Pacific bonds of late; these bonds are paying five per cent and are quoted at 80 to 85. The general situation regarding eastern properties continues to show improvement, of course, these comparisons are not to be considered as of 1906 and 1907, but when digested with years which were considered very satisfactory, the comparison appears good. The time is drawing near when railways will be complaining of congestion; this will cause a scramble for securities by the public, about that time it will prove a good time to take profits; as yet the public have not nibbled much, but are growing anxious.

The crop conditions are fairly out of the way, except corn, and twenty days more will put that question out of the way; then there will be clear sailing for another year. The election outcome seems not to worry the big people. Every now and then a scare is sounded, put out to send to the polls the crowd of stay-at-homes, which is a dangerous feature in this particular election; too many are figuring the outcome a sure thing. Looking ahead every condition points to renewed and general prosperity, probably the greatest the country has ever experienced. Local securities are awakening; there are many bargains to be had. The upward wave is just making its appearance west of the Rockies, and securities will soon show an upward tendency. The skies are clearing and better times are ahead.

Wooed Her Under Mexican Skies

The Butters family seem to have entered a period of cardiac cataclysms. Announcements of separations, engagements and marriages follow so closely that Mrs. Grundy finds that she cannot sort and file them away in a single molecule of gossip, as they threaten to expand to the circumference of the horizon. Even the marriage of Miss Dolly Tarpey and Mr. J. Paulding Edwards, which took place on Wednesday night at the Fairmont, was not accomplished without a few romantic interludes of which only their closest friends were cognizant. Mr. Edwards first met the fascinating Miss Tarpey in Mexico, and in the inspiring atmosphere of the gay capital, redolent of romance, they formed an attachment animated by mutual admiration, but the sojourn of each was cut short before Cupid had time to adjust his hooks. When they returned to California they went their separate ways and Cupid bided his time with his customary patience.

A Splendid Crest Ready

Mr. Edward's path led to Chico, where he is connected with the Northern Electric Road, which is owned by his step-father, Mr. Butters. Just after the estrangement of the elder Butters, Mr. Edwards heard rumors of Miss Tarpey's engagement to a young officer who had sailed with the fleet. He came down to have a reckoning with Cupid, and convinced Miss Tarpey that he had a prior lien on her affections. As he is the only one of Mrs. Butters' children by her former marriage in which Henry Butters still maintains a warm interest, he has not had to seek fresh fields, but holds the position at Chico. The other Edwards son, who married a niece of Mrs. Henry Wetherbee, the society leader of Alameda, has been gently but firmly separated from the comfortable berth which his stepfather had provided him. I hear that Mr. Butters even sent Miss Tarpey a handsome wedding present. Her own father provided her with a chest of silver, but as the Tarpey family have never taken sufficient genealogical interest to ascertain whether they could boast a crest, the groom's crest was engraved on the silver. Mrs. Butters has naturally provided her children with the best crest obtainable in Heraldry for Americans. Mrs. J. Paulding Edwards is a very attractive girl with an engaging manner not unlike her sister-in-law's, who was until she married Mr. Tarpey the popular Miss Hope Mayne of the Idora Park company.

Engagements in the Butters Family

The latest engagement rumor in the Butters family is concerned with the intentions of Miss Marguerite. She is said to look kindly on the suit of Mr. George Fuller, and as proof of the fact that they are engaged Mrs. Sherlock Holmes points to the diamond and sapphire locket, Mr. Fuller's gift, which she is permitted to wear. No date has yet been set for the wedding of Miss Marie Butters and young Metcalf. Miss Marie has spent the summer at Fouts Springs with the Metcalfs and I understand that the marriage has been deferred only because her fiance has not yet been measured for a position in keeping with his dignity and family name. When he resigned from the navy a few months ago the Victor Metcalf's confidently expected that Mr. Butters would look after the business interests of the young man, but since the family estrangement Mr. Butters has not shown any such disposition. Miss Marie has already purchased two complete trousseaux in Europe in anticipation of her marriage and her friends are wondering whether she will have to order a third before it is consummated.

The Greenways Under Any Other Name

Call the dances by any other name and they would still be Greenways, but nevertheless there is a warm splash of discussion about the change from "The Friday Night Club" to "The Assemblies." The conservatives, whose memory overlaps into the past, say that in spite of other clubs stealing the thunder there was never any real confusion about which Friday Night Club was THE dancing club. These people hold that it looks like a concession of dignity and power to change because another club has arrogated to itself a similar name. On the other hand, Mrs. Henry Scott, Mrs. Mountford Wilson, and several other old friends upon whom Mr. Greenway leans for advice thought it was the psychological moment to annex the Assembly and shed the clumsy and confusing old name. In every other city the smartest subscription balls are called the Assembly dances, but here the title has never come into its own as Mr. Greenway's dances have pre-empted first place. We have at various times in our gyrating past had an Assembly club, but it has never been robust enough to survive many seasons. The last time the ghost was raised by Mrs. Alfred Hunter Voorhies, but even under her kindly guidance and nursing the Assemblies went into a decline and passed away. It would seem that no one but a Greenway could resuscitate the name again and insure it against a social death rattle.

Awaiting Mrs. Buck

The climber who has just achieved Mrs. Buck's dances may not be so pleased at the change in names as the uninformed might imagine. It sounded so large to say,

The drastic new nomenclature makes it impossible to sprinkle cinnamon of this sort over the tea biscuit. Mrs. Buck will not be accompanied to San Francisco by her husband as has frequently been stated in the papers. While she manages her cotillions and skating clubs Dr. Buck will be forced to go on prescribing pills for the garrison near Manila at which he is stationed. It was expected that he would get a furlough but the request was not granted. Mrs. Buck, her island friends say, has wasted a great deal of tissue, as much in unproductive worry over her brother's escapades as in the heat. Bernardo is still looking for some one to pay for his business talents and I hear that Campbell Shorb's wife is teaching school to keep the nature fakirs from shooting at the wolf on the doormat. Friends of Miss Ethel Shorb still insist that her engagement will shortly be announced to an aid on the staff of General Funston. The officer is at present at Fort Leavenworth where was ordered with his superior.

Society on the Qui Vive

Mr. and Mrs. Orville Pratt will arrive in San Francisco about October the first and reside with Mr. Pratt's mother in California street. The house is now in the hands of the decorators. This action on the part of the Pratts will cause lively discussion in their set, as Mrs. Pratt, Sr., and Mrs. Russell Wilson have never been on visiting terms, and Mrs. Wilson strongly objected to the marriage of Emily to young Pratt. Mrs. Pratt, Sr., was the wife of Mr. Jones, of the shoe firm of Buckingham & Jones, from whom she was divorced. At the time of her marriage to the able jurist he also had obtained a divorce from his wife. Their marriage furnished tea table gossip for many a day. Mrs. James Keenig was Miss Adele Jones, and Mrs. Harding of Philadelphia, was Miss Lillie Jones, who at one time was reported to be engaged to "Bob" Morrow. Judge Pratt was never very fond of his beautiful young step-daughter. The judge bequeathed a very large fortune, but everybody was surprised to find that the widow was devised only $250 per month and the residue for life. The residue of the estate was left to Orville Pratt, Jr. The property was sadly crippled by the fire. Local society is keenly watching the homecoming of the young couple and the course of events in the new Pratt menage.

Smart Weddings in Honolulu

My Honolulu correspondent writes me that the smartest wedding that has taken place on the islands in a long while was that of Miss Edith Spalding to Lieutenant M. M. Garrett, of the Tenth Infantry, U. S. A., the bride being the eldest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. E. I. Spalding and a grandniece of Mr and Mrs. W. G. Irwin. Bishop Patrick officiated, the ceremony taking place before a large assemblage in St. Andrew's Cathedral, August 26th. The military predominated, the groom's best man and the ushers all being lieutenants from Fort Shafter, and there being a large number of army officers present in full dress uniform. The maid of honor was Miss Constance Restarick and the bridesmaids were the bride's sisters, the Misses Ethel and Alice Spalding. The bride is a decided beauty of the blonde type. Her father is the manager of Claus Spreckels & Co's bank.

of Mr. and Mrs. James F. Morgan, and Mr. John L. Flemin, will follow in a few days. Miss Morgan is exceedingly popular in the younger set. Her father is president of the Chamber of Commerce and active in public matters. Mr. Fleming is connected with the big concern of Alexander & Baldwin, and is a keen sportsman and captain of the Othu Polo Club.

Waiting for the Wedding Bells

The wedding of Miss Evelyn Norwood and William Breeze will take place on September 28th and will be a quiet home affair, to which one hundred and twenty-five intimate friends only will be invited. Miss Norwood is an only child. She is a tall, handsome young woman. Mrs. Norwood is the only sister of the three Hooper brothers. Mrs. Oscar Beatty is a cousin of the bride. Mr. Breeze is a son of Mrs. Thomas Breeze, and a brother of Mrs. Harry Benson, wife of Major Benson, U. S. A. Miss Louise Breeze is a sister of the groom. Mr. Breeze is the senior member of a prominent firm of local architects.

Married Amid Yellow Roses

The wedding of Miss Evaline Theobald, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. George Theobald, and Edwin Mastic Otis, son of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Otis, took place at the residence of the bride's parents Wednesday evening, September 2nd. Stephen Otis, brother of the groom, was best man. The ceremony was witnessed by the relatives only. A large reception followed. Seldom has a bride received such a bewildering array of presents. Mr. and Mrs. Otis will reside with the parents of the bride until their handsome home in Alameda is completed.

Cupids as Score Keepers

The innumerable social affairs thus far given complimentary to Miss Van Arsdale, who will wed Lieutenant Kurtz on September 16th, attest the popularity of this bride-to-be. One of the prettiest and most enjoyable was the afternoon of 500 to which Miss Aloise Gebhardt invited a number of her friends last Saturday. Mosses of pink tiger lilies and Cecil Bruner roses made a fragrant background for the youthful hostess and her guests, and the score cards of hand-painted cupids of varied moods created considerable merriment. Miss Gebhardt's guests included the Misses Amalia Simpson, Eleanor Landers, Laura Smith, Helen Gray, Dorothy Everett, Clarisse Lyons, Fernanda Pratt, Florence Booth, Lulette Mauvais, Elise Schultz, Mrs. Hugo Mansfeldt and Mrs. Harold Law.

Old Families United

By the marriage of Maxwell McNutt, son of Dr. McNutt and Mrs. Keegan, daughter of Mark McDonald, a bond of relationship was established between two families that have played conspicuous parts in the history of this State and that of late years have ceased to figure in the public eye. Dr. McNutt, by no means a has-been of the medical profession, was at one time the favorite physician of our provincial aristocracy. Two decades ago no child was considered well born in San Francisco that had not been ushered into the world by Dr. McNutt. A little over a quarter of a century ago the McDonald family exercised a great influence in the financial affairs of this city. It passed off the stage at the time of the failure of the Pacific Bank. Mark McDonald was seriously considered as available timber for the United States Senate, and properly to present his claims to the people he started a daily newspaper in this city. Both the McNutt and McDonald families, I hear, are pleased with the marriage of Maxwell McNutt and Mrs. Keegan, each of whom, by the way, ventured before in obedience to the persuasions of Cupid and met with misfortune, a circumstance that has served to render more ardent the felicitations of their friends on the happy consummation of their attachment.

Winners in the Golf Tournament

The golf tournament which was held last week on the Del Monte course was the best attended of any in the history of the game in California. More than fifty men qualified before the opening round was played and in the women's competition the entries were equally large. As the southern part of the State was almost as well represented in point of numbers as the northern section there was a considerable amount of earnestness and local pride put into the contests. A match over eighteen holes was played between teams representing northern and southern California for a trophy offered by the management of the Hotel Del Monte to be won twice by the same section of the State. Of the sixteen matches the northerners won nine, halved three, and lost four, winning the first leg of the trophy contest 9 to 4. In the finals competition for the Del Monte cup Miss Edith Cheesborough of the San Francisco Golf and Country Club won against Mrs. George Lane of the Sacramento Golf Club. The Del Monte cup for men was won by T. P. Mumford, captain of theAnnandale Golf Club of Pasadena, by defeating W. F. Garby, 5 up and 4 to play. The handicap tournament against bogey for men who failed to qualify for the first two flights was won by J. A. Lindsay, of Victoria, B. C., with T. H. Normand second. Chapin Tubbs of Burlingame won the consolation cup against bogey by defeating C. E. Maud.

THE FAMOUS DEL MONTE TENNIS COURTS AS THEY APPEARED IN THE TOURNAMENT OF 1907.

The first week of the Tournament just over has been the best attended in the history of contests in the State. The tournament will continue until Sept. 19th.

First Week of Tennis Tournament

The management of Del Monte is certainly to be congratulated on the success of the 1908 tournament for the championship of the Pacific Coast, the first week of which has just passed. Never in the history of California has such a crowd been brought together by a similar event. Of course the fact that the golf tournament of the preceding week was also an immense success and that many people who went down for that stayed over for the opening day's play of the tennis helped some. Then the two holidays, Monday and Wednesday, coming in the same week made another incentive for people to go down. Again the gathering of the Native Sons on the 9th at Monterey brought an immense crowd to that town and to Del Monte. Altogether the hotel was filled to more than capacity and the overflow filled Pacific Grove Hotel, which is under the same management. Such an aggregation of tennis talent has never before been brought together on the Pacific Coast, and Del Monte deserves great credit for its efforts to bring it about. While at this writing none of the final scores are available it is safe to say that with the array of talent at this tournament there will be many new records established. Next week will see the finals played off and as the interest is increasing the crowd that will witness the games on Friday and Saturday will probably again tax the accommodations of the hotel.

The Doctor and the Merry Widows

Most of the merry widows of Oakland are in their Directoire gowns and largest butterfly nets these lovely September days, trying their best to ensnare the attentions of a handsome young doctor. He has a tinge of gray hair to be sure but that is said to be only one of his many fascinations. Cupid has captured him twice so the merry widows know that he is vulnerable. Rumor hath it that the doctor has been more or less smitten with a very attractive rich young widow, and that the probabilities are that before long an announcement of their engagement will be made. Just now the handsome doctor is at Del Monte. By a curious coincidence so are several of the Oakland merry widows and among them the rich, demure young widow.

Social Attractions at Del Monte

My Monterey correspondent writes me that Del Monte is still the center of attraction socially and will continue to be for another fortnight. Many of those who came to witness the golf tournament last week concluded to remain for the tennis tourney, and enthusiasts of the latter sport have arrived in such numbers that the Hotel is overflowing with people. There have been a number of fascinating gowns worn and the scene on the verandas of the Hotel and clubhouse after the games is animated and picturesque. With the cat show in October and the open air performance of "As You Like It" for next month, the gayety will extend well into the fall. No more beautiful setting for this play could possibly be chosen than the grounds of Del Monte. It will be given under the auspices of the Monterey Civic Club, on October 9th, and the men's parts will be taken by leading society men of San Francisco under the stage management of Frank Mathieu, which latter fact is quite sufficient to assure the dramatic success of the undertaking. The sheath gown made its debut at Del Monte last Saturday night in all its skin-like adhesiveness and was the cynosure of all eyes. It was made of glistening white satin and there was not a suggestion of trimming or a break in the smooth surface of the garment. The slit which is really the most interesting detail of the Directoire gown was there all right, but in this case was filled with figured chiffon. The young woman who wore the costume gave further evidence of not possessing the strength of her convictions for the upper part of the gown was covered with a three-cornered gossamer shawl. There was much scurrying around in the lobby in order to catch a glimpse of the "slit," which of course when seen was somewhat disappointing. Mr. and Mrs. Wickham Havens motored down during the week and have with them Miss Avis Sterling, a sister of George Sterling, the poet. She is very pretty in her delicate doll-like fashion and has a very original way of dressing her hair. With the party is W. H. Lemiert, to whom Miss Sterling is engaged. Mr. and Mrs. Gerald Rathbone are here, also Mr. and Mrs. George Almer Newhall and Miss Genevieve King; the latter has come for a three weeks' visit; Mr. and Mrs. Robert L. Coleman and Mrs. Edwin R. Dimond, who has with her as her guest Miss Gertrude Bates. Wlifred B. Chapman, who was here earlier in the season with his family for quite a little visit, has come down again bringing with him as his guests L. H. de Walle, the Belgian vice-consul, and Dr. Otto Graf, Austro-Hugarian vice-consul. Among interesting brides and grooms who have been here during the week were Mr. and Mrs. Grove L. Johnson and Mr. and Mrs. Maxwell McNutt. Mr. Johnson, like John P. Irish, never wears a necktie and even on his wedding journey was minus this little accessory of dress.

Will Entertain This Winter

Colonel Simpson of the general staff of the Department of California has taken apartments at the Hillcrest and has established his charming young daughter a chatelaine. Miss Simpson has spent the last twelve years at a fashionable girl's school in New York, but she has a number of young friends here who have already entertained in her honor.

The Pasmore Concert at Century Hall Tuesday Evening

The Pasmore Trio will appear in concert for the first time since their departure for Europe three years ago, on next Tuesday evening. The decided success which they made in Europe, but especially in Berlin, where they played thirty-four times in public during the past two seasons, gives these young musicians a high position among the foremost young artists of the day. Arthur M. Abell, Berlin correspondent of the Musical Courier, in his criticism of a Pasmore Trio concert, says: "If there are three young women who can play the Tschaikowski Trio in A minor better than the Pasmore sisters, I have not heard them." The great Tschaikowski trio in A minor, written in memory of a great artist is the chief ensemble on Tuesday's program. Miss Mary Pasmore will play the Bach Chaccone for violin alone. The concert will begin with the Idyllic Mozart trio in G. This is a program to delight the heart of the true music lover. To accommodate students and those living across the bay a public rehearsal will be given at Century Hall on Sunday at 2:30 p. m. Admission fifty cents. Though a novelty here, this is a common practice in Germany.

In the Social Spotlight

The wedding of Miss Phyllis Moulton and Charles H. Merrill will be a quiet home affair in the home of the bride's parents at Fair Oaks, on September 17th.

Mr. and Mrs. Richard Hammond and Miss Julia Langhorne will sail from London September 13th and will reach home early in October.

Herr Karl von Newinski, who is visiting this country as an agent of the German government, is registered at the Hotel St. Francis.

Theatrical celebrities are much in evidence at the St. Francis this week. The latest arrivals include Dave Warfield, Amelia Summerville, who is making a great hit at the Orpheum, and Nat Goodwin, who is accompanied by his manager, George Weeden.

Mr. and Mrs. John Spruance have returned from the East and are at the Peninsula for an extended stay.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry T. Scott have returned to the St. Francis after a two weeks' visit to Tahoe.

Announcement is made of the engagement of Miss Marian Gough Speddy, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Thomas H. Speddy of Alameda, and ex-Commodore Lawrence Chester Knight. The wedding will take place at the Alameda home of the Speddys about the middle of October.

The wedding of Miss Gertrude Whittaker, daughter of Mrs. Andrew Whittaker of Galt, and Edward H. Gerber of Sacramento, took place last Tuesday evening at the Fairmont Hotel. Bishop Nichols performed the ceremony before a large gathering of friends.

Mrs. George C. Boardman, accompanied by her granddaughter, Miss Dora Winn, left this week for the East. This trip will defer Miss Winn's debut in society until another winter.

Rear-Admiral Richardson Clover, United States Navy, retired, former commander of the battleship Wisconsin, and Mrs. Clover and their family, of Washington, D. C., are at the St. Francis. They have been touring the coast in their big Packard and will remain in California for several weeks.

A very enjoyable luncheon was given at the Highlands, Ross, last week by Mrs. Clyde Payne. Dr. and Mrs. Payne have been spending the summer there.

Dr. Arnold Genthe is expected to arrive here from the Orient about October 8th.

James Phelps Stokes of New York City is a guest at the Fairmont.

Consul A. Rosenthal has taken apartments at the Highlands, Ross, for the remainder of the season.

Following close upon the visit at the Fairmont of the Duke de Montcalm, descendant of one of the most famous of the French commanders in America, another distinguished Frenchman and his party have taken apartments there. This is the Prince Ferdinand de Montpensier, son of the late Louis Philipe d'Orleans, who arrived in San Francisco on the Mongolia after a journey around the world. The prince is traveling incognito under the name of M. F. Villiers in order to escape the official and social attentions which would be shown him as the son of the Count of Paris.

Mr. and Mrs. Fred Kohl have returned from Lake Tahoe and have opened their Burlingame residence for the winter.

Mr. and Mrs. Downey Harvey are in town, the guests of Mr. and Mrs. Oscar Cooper.

Mr. and Mrs. J. Parker Whitney are in town preparing to go East next month.

Mrs. Emil Bruguiere has returned to Monterey and is contemplating a trip to Europe.

Mrs. Eleanor Martin has had her miniature painted more often than any one in San Francisco. She wants each one of her children and grandchildren to possess her miniature likeness and for that purpose is again sitting, this time to Mrs. Rose Hooper Plotner. Mrs. Plotner has just finished miniatures of the two little sons of the J. B. Coryells.

Mr. and Mrs. William Mintzer and Mrs. Teuxberry will soon close their Pacific avenue home and go East to spend the winter.

The promotion of Etienne Lanel, the French Consul-General of New York, to the position of Minister Plenipotentiary to Monte Video, Uruguay, came as very gratifying news to the friends of Miss Amy McKee of Oakland. Her marriage to M. Lanel, in Piedmont, took place only a short time ago. The promotion will introduce the new minister's wife into the high social honors of diplomatic life in South America. This advancement of course is a step toward a position in the European courts.

E. H. Harriman and party arrived in the city on Monday from his hunting lodge on Pelican Lake and registered at the Fairmont. On Tuesday the members of the San Francisco Manufacturers and Producers' Association tendered him a reception in the ballroom of the Fairmont in recognition of the invaluable services rendered by Mr. Harriman directly after the fire. Nearly every prominent business house was represented. The rooms of the hotel were beautifully decorated for the occasion. In the Harriman party were Mr. and Mrs. E. H. Harriman, Miss Mary Harriman, Miss Carol Harriman, Russell Harriman, Roland Harriman, Dr. Lyle and Thomas Pierce.

Among the arrivals at Byron Hot Springs during the past week were the following from San Francisco: Judge and Mrs. Frank Kerrigan, H. H. Cosgriff, C. H. Meyerstein, Miss Helen Gray, Miss Alice Small, Charles Mattheas, Mrs. Lewis, F. J. Anthony, S. Walker, S. H. Woodruff and Mr. and Mrs. L. B. Feigenbaum. Warfield's Art

Apparently Mr. David Belasco has found in David Warfield a worthy successor of Mrs. Leslie Carter. What Mrs. Carter used to do to us in "The Heart of Maryland," "Du Barry" and kindred dramas, Mr. Warfield is now doing in "The Music Master"—melting us visibly, converting us into fountains of tears and sending us home with a red nose and a damp handkerchief. And thus we are convinced of the greatness of his art. When an actor in one play lures you into a region of excited and gratified nerves, tears at your susceptibilities and blinds you with tears, and in another throws you into spasms of laughter, you cannot conscientiously withhold from him acknowledgment of the potency of his genius. Which reminds me that a few months ago I read an article on the relative merits of a few of the great actors of the American stage, among whom was included the star of the current Alcazar play. Though the laurels of premiership were awarded to Mr. E. H. Sothern, Warfield was ranked below that actor only for the reason that he has played but a small number and a narrow range of parts. It was admitted that his marvelous technique was flawless, that no acting on the American stage can compare with his for immediate effect, but doubt was expressed regarding his ability to interpret and realize poetic, imaginative and intellectual roles. Now it seems to me that the impression of this power is what one should carry away from Warfield's performance in "The Music Master." For to me it seems that to Warfield and not to Charles Klein, the author of the play, belongs the credit of the strong fascination which the character of Von Barwig exercises. In a play abounding in tawdry theatrical expedients, in claptrap, padded situations and conventional puppets, one character stands out as a beautiful conception, a masterly creation of dramatic art. The play with the exception of this human figure is nothing more than a compilation of graphic scraps, the best of which are borrowed from the opera of "La Boheme." Was the playwright sensible of the potentialities of his own puppet? Painters have not always seen all the beauty and poetry of their own masterpieces. The imaginative critic can discover much that is unknown to the artist. David Warfield, I am sure, has breathed poetry and feeling into the Klein puppet. He has created a beautiful personified ideal, and by his powers of mimicry presents to us a portrait as lifelike as Dickens could have drawn. How absurd to doubt that the actor with the imagination for such an achievement has an amplitude of power sufficient to compass the most complex roles! Warfield is as effective in his assault on the emotions as Mrs. Carter was in the heyday of her career, but his method is not so obvious. The fact is that Warfield is a genuine artist, and actor by temperament and by brain. The thought that comes to him translates itself into feeling and the embodied impulse is before you. Every change of expression in his face is full of living significance, and when he stands motionless with every muscle in repose nothing can be more expressive than his face at those moments. So perfect is his technique that there is spontaneity in his every action, and every sensation that he yields to he makes others feel. His portrayal of the sweet-tempered, optimistic old music master is a thing of beauty that will be cherished among the most delightful memories of the stage.

—Theodore Bonnet.

Most Striking New Play of the Season

Of the six new plays thus far produced in New York this season, "The Devil" has created by long odds the deepest interest and the widest discussion, not so much on account of the rivalry between the companies playing it as because of the masterly way in which the subject is handled. The story runs through three acts and in each the Hungarian author, Fereuc Molnar, has boldly set forth in dialogue and actions the passions of the human soul; all through it the Devil appears to be laughing at the very weaknesses he has portrayed. The plot is not a novel nor a striking one, but it is deftly worked out. An artist is in love with the beautiful wife of a wealthy merchant. She, too, loves, but fears to express her passion. The Devil appears on the stage within five minutes after the curtain has gone up and quits it in the last act, when his work is accomplished. The artist hesitates.

THE ONE THOUSAND DOLLAR "BEAUTY BROILERS."

As they appear in "The Girl Question" at the Van Ness Theatre for two weeks beginning Monday, September 14th.

The merchant's wife, Jolan, hopes to bury her own passion by seeming to approve of his marriage to a frivolous young creature named Vilma. She is already aware that he has befriended a model, but that incident in the artist's life only quickened her desire to see him the husband of Vilma. The Devil, in the disguise of a benign philanthropist, gradually enters the lives of the artist and Jolan. They fear him at first, but come to like his manners, and eventually fall into the path he has planned for them. There are several dramatic incidents in the progress of this play, notably in the second and last acts. The impelling figure, however, is that of the ever-present philanthropist. He is here, there; in the studio at three in the afternoon, and at midnight the wonder of a grand assemblage, attending a reception given by Jolan's husband. In the last act Jolan hurries into Sandor's studio. She is almost beside herself with joy. She has calmly assured herself that the storm is passed, that once she has in her possession a certain communication she has written at the dictation of the benevolent philanthropist there would be no recurrence of the temptation. She found there the same suave gentleman who had surprised her in the same place only a few hours before. She told him of her determination. She was anxious to know if he had given her communication to Sandor. The Devil said that he had not, and for a moment she was happy. Within five minutes she had told him in her own language what she had written at the Devil's dictation. Then that amiable gentleman recalled that he had not presented her letter to Sandor. Would he do so now? The curtain is falling when the lovers leave the studio arm in arm. When it hides half the audience there is only one figure on the stage, the dominant character of the play, the benevolent gentleman of the world, the Devil.

DAVID BELASCO
The noted playwright and manager

Record Success of "The Music Master"

Never in the annals of the San Francisco stage has a more emphatic hit been scored than by David Warfield in "The Music Master" at the Alcazar. After that memorable opening performance last Monday evening, the people who witnessed it no longer tried to find reason for the play and the stellar player having appeared four consecutive seasons in New York to capacity-taxing audiences. "It is more than mere art—it is genius," was an apt comment on Mr. Warfield's work. It is in the intensely human note of the play that its appeal consists. David Belasco was quick to find it in Charles Klein's work and as quick to utilize his marvelous knowledge of stage values in its development. With any other actor than Warfield or any other producer than Belasco interested in its promotion, "The Music Master" would not have attained the almost unequalled success it has met with wherever presented. It is a striking example of the playwright's dependence upon the efforts of the stage director and the actors. Belasco and Warfield have transformed "The Music Master" into a classic. "The Music Master" begins its second week at the Alcazar next Monday, and the advance sale presages another series of crowded houses. It is to be followed by Mr. Warfield's latest success, "A Grand Army Man," which ran all of last season in New York and will be revived there when the Warfield company returns. This play was constructed by David Belasco, Pauline and Marion Short, and is said to afford Mr. Warfield scope for the display of certain histrionic qualities which none of his preceding vehicles contained.

To Open With "The Great Ruby.."

The Valencia Theatre, San Francisco's finest playhouse, located on Valencia street, between Thirteenth and Fourteenth streets, will be formally opened next Saturday night with a specially organized permanent stock company, in "The Great Ruby." This theatre was designed for the home of the best stock company in San Francisco. The claim is made that when the house is thrown open to the public, on September 12th, the most beautiful and complete theatre on the coast will be on view. The house cost over $200,000, and is first-class in every respect. It seats seventeen hundred people, is strictly fireproof, and will undoubtedly take front rank among the local theatres. "The Great Ruby" was written by Cecil Raleigh for the London Drury Lane Theatre, where it enjoyed great popularity. It is in six acts and sixteen scenes, and is therefore a gigantic undertaking for any stock company to prepare for a week's presentation. The play is a thrilling and spectacular drama in which the great ruby is stolen from a jewelry store, and the subsequent acts show the efforts of detectives, police, an Indian prince, and various other persons to recover it. Incidental to the production, a big tallyho coach with four horses will be driven on the stage; there will be four automobiles in use, and at the end of the fourth act there will be a balloon ascension, in which a real balloon is used. The new Valencia stock company is headed by Robert Warwick, the well-known leading man, who has appeared in a similar capacity with Mary Mannering, Katherine Grey and Virginia Harned. He is a tall, handsome, talented actor, and is expected to become popular at once with the Valencia patrons. The leading woman is Miss Willette Kershaw, an exceedingly beautiful and clever young actress, who has held

"The Girl Question" at the Van Ness

The first big musical success of the season to come here will be "The Girl Question," which is announced for next Monday night, September 14th, at the Van Ness Theatre. The music play, which had a run of three hundred and thirty-nine performances at the La Salle Theatre, Chicago, comes with a splendid cast of players and chorus which fully entitles it to be called the girliest of girl shows. The musical book is by Will Hough and Frank Adams and the music is the work of Joseph E. Howard, who are also responsible for that other notable success, "The Time, the Place and the Girl." Among the leading people to appear here in "The Girl Question" are Paul Nicholson, Henrietta Tedro, Marguerita De Von, Nina Collins, Thomas De Vassy, Russell Lennon, Lewis Wood and a dozen others. Many novel features are introduced in this production, one of which will make a particular hit. It is the musical typewriter number, which opens the third act. The chorus girls, representing stenographers, are seated at machines, and as they operate the keys chimes operated by electricity and played at various points about the theatre plays an accompaniment to the words of their song. Among the musical hits are "Oh, Gee, Be Sweet to Me, Kid," "I Hate to Work on Monday," "Waltz Me Until I'm Dreamy" and "When Eyes Like Yours Look Into Mine." There is a big demand for seats and the opening night will be quite an event of the season. The prices for this engagement are $1.50, $1.00, 75c and 50c.

"Maritana" at the American Theatre

"Maritana," one of the most melodious light operas and a prime favorite with music lovers, is to receive a sumptuous revival during the coming week at the American Theatre by the Persse-Mason Opera Company, commencing with the matinee performance on Sunday, September 13th. It is the story of Don Caesar de Bazan set to music by Vincent Wallace and contains an interesting plot in addition to many sweet ballads. While "Maritana" has not been sung in this city of late years, its delightful music is well known to opera lovers. The many musical gems in the opera are piano classics. "Let Me Like a Soldier Fall," "Turn on Old Time," "Alas, Those Chimes," "'Tis the Harp in the Air," "Hear Me, Gentle Maritana," and "Scenes That are Brightest," are a few of the popular ballads. The plot deals with the attempt of Don Jose to get King Charles of Spain into a compromising entanglement with the beautiful gyspy girl Maritana in order to stir up trouble with the Queen. It happens that Don Caesar de Bazan, a dissipated knight, has been arrested and sentenced to be hanged for entering into a duel and his sentence is commuted upon his promise to marry the beautiful Maritana. Don Jose however endeavors to palm off an ugly old marchioness upon Don Caesar in order to keep the fair gypsy girl for his fiendish purposes in connection with the scheme to create a disturbance in the household of King Charles II. The ruler makes a passionate appeal to Maritana, who scorns his professions of love, and Don Caesar disguised as a monk learns of the entire plot. Don Jose in a fit of anger has both Maritana and Don Caesar imprisoned but the author works out the plot in a most satisfactory manner, as the opera has a very pretty ending. Edith Mason, the sweet-voiced and popular prima donna will sing the title role, while all of the other artists will have congenial parts. Thomas Persse will be heard as Don Caesar de Bazan; Charles Swickard as the wily Don Jose; Robert Lett as the King; Bernice Holmes as Lazarillo; Joseph Fogarty as the Captain; and Arthur Mesmer as the Marquis. "Maritana" will be the bill for one week, with matinees on Saturday and Sunday. Popular prices will prevail.

CHARMION

The Perfect Woman, who will appear next week at the Orpheum.

MISS WILLETTE KERSHAW.

Leading woman of the stock company now playing at the new Valencia Theatre.

Hartman in "The Fortune Teller"

The program at the Princess Theatre for Monday night and all next week will be the musical comedy by Victor Herbert and Harry B. Smith, "The Fortune Teller." This will be its first production here at popular prices and the presentation will be a magnificent and complete one. Ferris Hartman will appear as Boris, an ancient gypsy. It is one of his best roles and affords him a splendid opportunity for displaying his great skill as a character actor. An interesting incident of the performance will be the reappearance of the delightful young soprano, Christina Nielson, who will have the dual role of Musette, a gypsy fortune teller, and Isma, a pupil in the Ballet school, in which she has met with great success elsewhere. Arthur Cunningham is happily cast as Sander, a gypsy musician. Melvin Stokes, who it will be remembered was very successful at the Tivoli, will reappear after quite an absence. He will impersonate Captain Ladislas of the Hungarian Huzzars. It is a character that he is eminently qualified to shine in and will display his fine tenor voice to great advantage. The remainder of the cast is as follows: General Korbay, Wallace Brownlow; Vaninka, a gypsy girl, Sarah Edwards; Fresco, a ballet master, Walter De Leon; Count Berezowski, a Polish composer, Walter Catlett; Rafael, a gypsy boy, Mabelle Baker. The story is a pretty and interesting one and is interpreted with very charming music.

Sensational Acts at the Orpheum

The bill at the Orpheum for the week beginning this Sunday matinee will have for its chief noved feature Charmion, the most perfectly developed woman in the world, who has probably been the cause of more discussion than any artist on the vaudeville stage. She appears gowned in one of Paquin's latest and most beautiful creations and thus gowned she ascends the trapeze high above the stage. Then she tosses her hat and gloves lightly to the floor and garment by garment her raiment flutters to the stage until she is beheld in the close-fitting costume of the athlete. All this is accomplished in such a thoroughly modest manner that even the most refined find nothing in it to shock their sensibilities. She concludes with a wonderfully graceful, daring and thrilling gymnastic performance. Frank Gardiner and Lottie Vincent will introduce their spectacular fantasy, "Winning a Queen," which is one of the most attractive of vaudeville conceits. Mr. Vincent appears as a Knight of the Road on the battlements of Port Arthur. He is warned away by the sentry and crawls into a cannon through the loading door to take a nap. Immediately after the great gun is fired and by the ingenious combination of a moving picture and stereopticon the tramp is seen passing through the clouds until he is absorbed by the mouth of an immense faced moon. The scene changes to the mountains of the moon where the Queen of the Moon and the tramp meet and become enamored of each other. She agrees to return to earth with her visitor and summons her favorite star, on which they both depart. The planet bursts through the skylight of a house in which the pair introduce their specialties which have made them so famous, including songs by Miss Vincent and acrobatic dancing by Mr. Gardiner. The other new people will be Fred Warren and Al Blanchard, two minstrel and musical comedy stars of renown; A. O. Duncan, America's representative ventriloquist, who is without a peer in his line of business, and the Two Pucks, two of the cleverest youngsters who have been seen on the stage in many a day. They will introduce new songs and novel costumes. With this program Amelia Summerville, the three Moshers and the immense sensation, the Trapnell family of acrobats, will conclude their engagements. A new series of Orpheum motion pictures will close the program.

New Victor Herbert Opera

"Algeria," the Victor Herbert-Glen MacDonough opera which opened in New York this week, is described as a new musical play which deals with that portion of Africa, as the name implies, which is ruled by the French and called Algiers. The story has to do with a rebellion of some native tribes against the French government and involves in its development French officers, two Americans and an Englishman, the beautiful sultana of a desert tribe of Arabs, and many Moorish and oriental characters. The comedy roles are furnished in the persons of three deserters from the Foreign Legion of the French army. The two acts of the piece are staged respectively in an oasis of the Desert of Sahara and the exterior of an old palace near the city of Algiers. Ida Brooks Hunt, as the Sultana, has the prima donna role. William Pruette, as the governor-general of Algiers; George Leon Moore, as a young French officer, Harriet Burt, as a medical practitioner, and Florence Nash, as an American bride on her honeymoon, are in the cast.

Stage Limelights

Following "The Girl Question" at the Van Ness Theatre comes the other girly music play, "The Time, the Place and The Girl."

The comedy drama success, "Checkers," will play a limited engagement at the Van Ness Theatre next month.

Rose Stahl is coming to the coast with "The Chorus Lady."

Dustin Farnum will be seen here a few weeks hence in the elaborate production of "The Squaw Man." Farnum is a great favorite in this city and he should make a big hit in this drama of the West.

One of the important attractions booked for early appearance here is "The Clansman." It will be played by a powerful company of well-known actors. The production has been a tremendous success for the past three seasons in the East.

Orders in Ancient Times

An interesting find recently made in the ruins of Thebes shows that orders existed in Egpyt centuries before our time. The explorers came across a mummy in a tomb bearing on the neck the remains of a collar decorated with three flies in gold, each measuring about a dozen centimeters. The hieroglyphics explained that the dead had been decorated by Aa-Hotep, founder of the eighteenth dynasty, for services performed.

An Entente Cordiale of Beggars

The developments of the entente cordiale between Great Britain and France are unceasing. The latest is a one-legged entente, that is to say, there is to be an invasion of London by the crippled and one-legged Frenchmen belonging to the Union of French Mendicants, which was established eighteen months ago at Marseilles. M. Rosin, the one-legged president, has conceived the notion of celebrating the entente cordiale by organizing a visit to the Franco-British exhibition. A number of the same one-legged men who tramped from Marseilles to Paris last year are to walk from Dover to London selling post cards and other articles by the way. "My desire," explains M. Rosin, "is to bring about a meeting between French and British peddlers who are minus one of their legs. I don't want any humbugs, but genuine hard-working, honest British mendicants, itinerant musicians, hawkers and pavement artists. Just think what a fine thing it would be to have a banquet in London of French and British one-legged men." If M. Rosin's plan is successfully carried out the only thing left to cement the entente cordiale is a visit from the apaches of Paris to the hooligans of London.

The Truth About the Mosquito

At the time of the discovery of the mosquito's agency in breeding disease it was not dreamed that far more than the germ of the truth had been revealed many years before. The truth was told in 1853 in the obscure columns of the Gaceta Official, published at the port of Camana, Venezuela, and a little later in a brief note or two that the discoverer wrote to the Academy of Sciences in Paris. It was buried in those pages and forgotten, and has now been resurrected by the Havana Cronica Medico and the British Medical Journal. In May, 1853, Louis Daniel Beauperthuy, a native of Guadeloupe, and health officer at Camana, wrote to the Gaceta Official that for fourteen years he had made a microscopic study of the blood and secretions in every type of fever and had discovered that yellow fever resulted from the stings of several species of mosquitos. "The mosquito plunges its proboscis into the skin and introduces a poison which has properties akin to that of snake venom. It softens the red blood corpuscles, causes their rupture and facilitates the mixing of the coloring matter with the serum." Beauperthuy's facts and deductions were so remote from all the medical teachings of that day that they were doubtless laughed at and promptly forgotten. Probably the priority of his discovery will now be acknowledged, but it might have been a profound blessing to the world it scientific research had been able in the middle of the last century to proceed along the lines suggested by Beauperthuy's announcement.

Superstition of Russian Peasants

A St. Petersburg correspondent sends the following story as an illustration of the superstition of the Russian peasantry. A time-expired soldier named Karuko, living in the province of Podolsk, married a young girl and settled down in the same house with his parents, as is the usual custom in Russia. The girl's mother-in-law used her harshly, as is another custom of the country, and encouraged her son to beat his wife rather more than the custom warrants. Finally he beat her so that she died. He fled to the woods and hanged himself to a tree. The couple were buried with all the rites of the church, but unfortunately for some time after there was a drought which began to threaten the crops. The wiseacres of the village came to the conclusion that the absence of rain was God's vengeance upon them for condoning murder and suicide by giving Christian burial to the criminal. The matter was discussed by the mir, and in the dead of night a party went to the graveyard, unearthed the body of Karuko, tore the clothes off it, removed the little cross which all orthodox Russians wear around the neck in life and in death and flung the naked corpse down in unconsecrated ground. The police are now busy selecting representatives of the guilty villagers to bear the punishment allotted by law for violating the sanctity of the grave, but as rain has since fallen in quantity sufficient to save the crops the peasantry cannot but be convinced that their action was perfectly justified in every way.

Auto Notes

A. H. Busch and family of Los Angeles are spending a few days in this city, having made the run of 462 miles in their Thomas 40 and having been about four days on the way. Mr. Busch feels that his car has made a very good record, having consumed only forty-four gallons of gasoline on the trip. The party will return to Los Angeles early in the week.

W. S. Gilmore, of the Kruse Lumber Company, has equipped his big White steamer with an electric siren. It takes six dry cells to run the siren, but by merely pressing a button the driver can make a noise like the sound that comes from a menagerie when the animals are being fed.

The Pioneer Automobile Company has reecived word from the Chalmers-Detroit Motor Company that they are now turning out fifteen Chalmers "30" per day. The Pioneer Automobile Company have sold over eighty of these cars, and after the 15th of September will receive them at the rate of fifteen per week. They expect shortly to be caught up on back orders.

The new six-cylinder 40 h. p. Thomas car, which will arrive next week, is reported to be one of the fastest stock cars on the market.

Frank Nelson, son of Fernando Nelson, the Los Angeles record holder, returned yesterday from a tour of Lake county in his father's White steamer. He reports that the mountain roads are still in fair shape in spite of the heavy teaming which has been done over them.

Twenty-six trips to Santa Cruz at an average of four hours and thirty minutes is the remarkable record to date of the 1906 Thomas car of Charles C. Moore, the well-known motorist of this city. Scarcely a week passes but the old green Thomas is not sent over the strenuous trip from this city to the sea beach and return, not to mention numerous other short tours, and still the machine has not yet had its first introduction to a repair shop. The car has been driven 40,000 miles.

The Pioneer Automobile Company report the following sales of Chalmers-Detroit cars: F. H. Huffman, R. Hunt, P. J. Cartland, S. H. Taylor, L. Jacobsen, R. H. Robinson, of Eureka, L. H. Mayhew, J. Giblin, A. Stratton, L. Young, S. Marner, C. Lenhardt and L. B. Ray.

Fernando Nelson left in his White steamer for Lake Tahoe yesterday afternoon. He was accompanied by Mrs. Fernando Nelson, his daughter, Adelia, and son, Frank. They expect to be gone for a week during which time the steamer which holds the San Francisco-Los Angeles record will be driven over the steepest grades of the high Sierras.

One of the first orders to be taken by the Pioneer Automobile Company for a Chalmers-Detroit car was that of Dr. Ward, a local auto enthusiast. The lightness and speed of the little car are expected to make it popular among physicians and business men.

Demonstrations in Oakland are an easy matter in comparison to the task of showing a prospective customer the qualities of a car over the hills in San Francisco, according to A. C. Wheelock, the transbay representative of the Pioneer Automobile Company. "Demonstrating in San Francisco, I had to take the Chalmers-Detroit up the worst hills in the city to prove to prospective buyers the hill-climing ability of the motor, while over here I can turn her loose on the boulevard and when we reach the fifty-mile-an-hour clip the customer is usually satisfied."

A feature of the great forest fires at Fernie that recalls the San Francisco disaster was the work of a White steamer as a fire fighter and life saver during the conflagration. The machine, a twenty horse-power model "L" White steamer, is the property of V. Hyde Baker of Cranbrook, one of the wealthiest and best known lumbermen of British Columbia. While the terrible fire was devastating the country in all directions the steamer was hurrying fire fighters and their implements to every point where there was a chance of checking the fierce flames. Day and night the sturdy little car was on the go, stopping only to take on oil and gasoline. Several drivers were worn out in the wild flights over the Kootenai mountains, but the steamer never stopped until the fire was out. Thanks to the speed and durabililty of his White, Baker had the satisfaction of saving all of his vast holdings as well as the lives and timber claims of a large number of his neighbors. The fast work of the car over the rough roads about Cranbrook was a revelation to the natives, who were surprised to see an automobile travel over them, even under ordinary conditions.

In the new Chalmers-Detroit "30" the Unit Power Plant is used, as in the latest Decauville, the new Hispano-Suiza, and the Motobloc. Motor, clutch and transmission form a single unit, so they cannot get out of line.

The Pioneer Automobile Company reports the following sales of Chalmers-Detroit cars: J. S. Giblin, Marysville; W. L. Taylor, Florin, Cal., and F. B. Morton.

natural death. The oldest specimens felled are still sound at heart.

There can be no question of the very rapid growth of the sequoia gigantea inasmuch as the species was unknown until 1852 and no seeds were sent to England before 1853, yet trees have been grown there that have attained a remarkable girth and altitude. One such specimen exceeds sixty feet in height and ten feet in girth, at three feet from the ground. A single cone contains from two hundred to three hundred seeds, averaging about one-quarter of an inch long by three-sixteenths wide. The seed is strikingly like the seed of a parsnip. Millions of these seeds are ripened annually by a single tree. In a fruitful year the production of one of the northern groves would be enough to plant all the mountain ranges of the world. But few of the millions of seeds which fall to the ground germinate and of those that do perhaps not one in ten thousand is suffered to live through the many vicissitudes of storm, drought, fire and snow crushings that beset their youth. Despite their fecundity the trees have not increased their range since the glacial period and have barely managed to hold their own in a climate locally favorable.

The average height of these trees is two hundred and seventy-five feet. There are specimens, however, that have scaled over four hundred feet in height, notably the Father of the Forest, now down. The base of this stump is one hundred and ten feet in circumference. Truly "there were giants in those days." "Old Hercules" lifts his scarred top three hundred and twenty-five feet into the upper air and is ninety-five feet in circumference at the base. General Grant of the King's River grove is another mammoth and is said to be forty feet in diameter. There are some half dozen of these forest giants now standing. whose trunks have been tunneled and so permit six-horse stage coaches loaded with passengers to drive through them. In the Calaveras grove lies a fallen giant. its exterior burned out, which furnishes a passage for a man on horseback to ride through for a distance of ninety feet. Dotting the groves are several such fallen giants whose hollow interior will easily furnish sleeping accommodations for a company of soldiers. The stump of the original Dowd tree in the Calaveras grove was long used as a dancing platform. It is twenty-three feet in diameter and provides ample room for thirty-two people to dance the cotillion besides allowing seventeen musicians and onlookers to group themselves around. The General Sherman is two hundred and eighty feet high and one hundred and three feet in circumference at the base. It is estimated that it contains 300,000 feet of lumber. A timber cruiser, who figured on its dimensions, said there was enough timber in it to fence and cross fence one hundred and sixty acres of land. build a seven-room house, barn and outbuildings and leave enough refuse to supply firewood for a year. From this tree alone, he figured, there could be constructed fifteen frame houses, each two stories high.

THE LIGHT INVISIBLE

By L.

O Light that lives on every hill and shore,
Beyond the night that dies at close of day,
The tears fill up the chalice of mine eyes
With gladness, when I see Thee far away.

O Stream that flows until the world shall end,
Past fretful town and hermitage and field,
Red are thy waters, but they throb with peace;
I touch their dew and all my wounds are healed.

O Voice that speaks in every grove and street,
Above the song of birds and oaths of men,
I hear and follow Thee, altho my steps
Begin a course that lies beyond my ken.

O Face returning at each Eucharist,
More close than forms that change with changing years,
I am the veil between myself and Thee,
Burn Thou the veil, and, burning, kill my fears.

O Guest that comes to take away our best,
And all the loves we garner at our side,
Thou art our Best, our Home art Thou. For Thee, Attentive I will labor and abide.

A HOME THRUST

Years ago Mark Twain used to be fond of telling this story: At the dinner table one day there was a party of guests for whom Mark was doing his best in the way of entertainment. A lady turned to the daughter of the humorist, then a little girl, and said: "Your father is a very funny man."

"Yes," responded the child, "when we have company!"—Life.

Jack London's New Novel

Jack London's next novel, "Martin Eden," is being reviewed in advance of publication and already hailed as his greatest work. It appears to be more or less biographical, but whether it is so intended or not it is pretty sure that at least half the critics will see the author in its hero. It is reported that the manuscript has been sold to a western publisher for seven thousand dollars in cold cash, but "west" is a rather illusive locality. Boston talks of Pittsburg as "the west," and New York's range of vision stops at Chicago. Anything further than that becomes "the Orient." The Macmillans have had the handling of all London's books since the first four, and his catalogue now enumerates some seventeen volumes exclusive of "Martin Eden."

A Daintily Attractive Story

"The Postscript" is one of those rare books which brings to mind that quaint saying of Adachi Kinnosuke, that it is a pity one cannot protect favorites from the vandal rabble as one shuts them out of a garden, by building a wall around it, for Eleanor Stuart has written for the chosen few, not for the dwellers in the market place. There are fewer than two hundred small pages but the effect is that of violets, mignonette and forget-me-nots. It is sorrowful without being sad. Indeed it is almost cheerful, if the apparent incongruity can be comprehended. An American girl of Quaker parentage has married and lived happily with an Italian count until his death. During all the period of their union there has been no cloud on their mutual confidence and afterwards, from every side come confirmations of the worthiness and honor of the dead—from every side but one. Di Foresti, a friend of the Count, enters upon the scene, and manages, while apparently honoring him, to give the impression that there was concealed dishonor, and that his every aim and object is to protect these secrets. Esther, being childless, has had her attention attracted by a little orphan child whom she is led to believe is the illegitimate offspring of the count and whom she adopts. In truth it is Di Foresti who is the child's father, his mother being the daughter of one of those visionary "reformers" who preach revolutionary doctrines and then take the conventional attitude towards those of their own households who mistake the gospel of revolt for holy writ. Di Foresti succeeded in beclouding the memory of his dead friend for a brief period, in the hope of marrying the young widow to the betterment of his own fortunes, but there was a "Postscript" to her happiness in the re-establishment of perfect faith. A mere outline of the plot conveys no idea of the thoughtful grace of the style and the dignified treatment of a difficult subject. "The Postscript" is one of the most attractive of the many beautiful books that have been put forth by the McClure Company.

"The Lure of the Mask"

Harold MacGrath delights in the mysteries of a social incognito, and his various admirers know exactly what to expect, consequently the title of his latest romance, "The Lure of the Mask", taken together with the presentment of the auburn-haired beauty holding a half-mask in her upraised hand is a fair index to all that is coming. Mr. MacGrath never wastes time beating about the bush, and the curtain rises on John Hillard, young, though past his first youth, rich, and unattached, leaning from the window of his New York apartment one January midnight. Beneath him there passed an unknown, supposedly fair and young, who attracted his attention by singing in a cultivated voice a couplet from the opera "La Fille de Madame Angot," singing in Italian, too. Hillard, as is the wont of the hero, must needs start in pursuit of the fair cantatrice, only to be baffled by her disappearance in the fog, and he must needs make a further effort to discover her through the medium of the Agony column of a daily paper. Of course if the beautiful lady had not happened to see that particular journal, or if she had not perused the wails of the anguished, or if she had not taken any notice of the appeal, there would not have been four hundred pages of varied adventure to record, but she did, as was her proper role, do all these things and consequent upon the correspondence entered into there came a dinner party of two to which Hillard was convoyed with eyes bandaged to meet his inamorata masked. Then the lady disappeared. Meanwhile Hillard's nearest approach to a friend has an affair with a charming soubrette, "pretty Kitty Killigrew," and "pretty Kitty" has her head set on very level indeed. Merrihew has an income of seven thousand a year, and strive as he will, he finds himself invariably just a thousand to the bad on each recurring New Year. "Pretty Kitty" is an expert mathematician at least as far as subtraction goes, and she has no delusions concerning two being able to live on less than one, so she is off to Europe with a wild-goose American operatic company whose manager thinks he sees a fortune in Italy and Germany, where the exiled American tourist is supposed to be pining for American musical comedy and Broadway attractions. There is a mysterious prima donna connected with the company, likewise, dire failure of the enterprise, and a very proper villain who turns up whenever there is the remotest danger that the boat will sail on an even keel. Hillard, who is Italian born and has lived most of his life abroad, is seized with a desire to return to his birthland, and Merrihew with the magnet of his "pretty Kitty," needs no particular urging to accompany him. There is the usual ducking and dodging until the god out of the machine, in the shape of an Italian peasant with a wrong to avenge, providentially removes an objectionable half-husband and leaves a martyred half-wife free to inherit her estates. Then follows the customary wedding bells and two pair of fond lovers are conventionally united. "The Lure of the Mask" is a very good specimen of this particular sort of thing, as well as of the author's specialty. As Abraham Lincoln once remarked, "For those that like this sort of thing, this sort of thing is liked." It is good vacation reading, will make no demands on the intellect, whatever its drafts on credulity, and will entail no more hardship on the mental digestion than a luncheon of soda crackers and fresh milk will do to the physical. No. 15,983.

NANCY THERESA BERGEMAN-HAVERLY,
Plaintiff,
vs.
PAUL J. BERGEMAN-HAVERLY,
Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA send greeting to PAUL J. BERGEMAN-HAVERLY, Defendant.

YOU ARE HEREBY REQUIRED to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, on the ground of defendant's extreme cruelty towards plaintiff, also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

GIVEN under my hand and the Seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 14th day of April, A. D. 1908.

Defendants.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA to all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described, or any part thereof, Defendants, Greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Catherine Stapleton, plaintiff, filed with the Clerk of the above-entitled Court and County, within three (3) months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property, or any part thereof, situate, lying and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and particularly described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the westerly line of Franklin street, at its intersection with the northerly line of Ivy avenue, and running thence northerly along said westerly line of Franklin street twenty-five (25) feet, thence at right angles westerly and parallel with the north line of Ivy avenue one hundred and seven (107) feet six (6) inches, thence at right angles southerly twenty-five (25) feet to the northerly line of Ivy avenue, thence at right angles easterly and along said northerly line of Ivy avenue one hundred and seven (107) feet six (6) inches to the westerly line of Franklin street, and the point of commencement, being a portion of Western Addition, Block No. 139.

And you are hereby notified that unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit:

That it be adjudged that the plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple absolute; that her title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiff recover her costs herein and have such other and further relief as may be meet in the premises.

WITNESS my hand and the seal of said Court, this 31st day of August, A. D. 1908.

(Seal) H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.
By D. J. CREAMER, Deputy Clerk.

MEMORANDUM.

The first publication of this summons was made in Town Talk newspaper on the 5th day of September, A. D. 1908.

The following persons are said to claim an interest in, or lien upon, said property adverse to plaintiff:

The Hibernia Savings & Loan Society, a corporation, organized and existing under the laws of the State of California, and having its principal place of business and postoffice address at the northwest corner of McAllister and Jones streets, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, has and claims a lien secured by mortgage upon the lot of land described in the complaint of plaintiff on file herein, and in this Summons.

JOHN J. BARRETT,
Attorney for Plaintiff,
Rooms 1255-1257 Flood building, 870 Market Street, San Francisco.

SUMMONS

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA, IN AND FOR THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO.

No. 17,992. Dept. No. 10.

MICHAEL FARRARA,
Plaintiff,
vs.
LUCIE FARRARA,
Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA, send greeting to LUCIE FARRARA, Defendant.

YOU ARE HEREBY REQUIRED to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, on the ground of defendant's extreme cruelty, also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

GIVEN under my hand and the Seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 29th day of July, A. D. 1908.

(Seal of the Superior Court.

Tolstoi and the Holy Synod

The Holy Synod at St. Petersburg has once more given impetus to the sale of Count Leo Tolstoi's works. In anticipation of the celebration of Tolstoi's eightieth birthday the Holy Synod issued an appeal to members of the Orthodox church to abstain from participating in the affair, basing the appeal on the ground that the aged author being an enemy of the Church, demonstrations in his honor might prove mischievous. The appeal had no other effect than that of intensifying public interest in the celebration and bringing the attention of the world to the deep affection of the Russian people for the excommunicated fanatic. Aside from the fatuity of the religious motive that dictated the appeal, the uncharitableness of the spirit by which it was inspired was enough to provoke resentment. The aged Russian evangelist and gentle apostle of the cult of simplicity, slowly bending his footsteps to the grave, is a figure that strongly appeals to the tender emotions. To interpolate a note of discord in the symphony of love evoked by the occasion of his natal anniversary, and to point to him at such a time as a menace to society and an object of aversion, is to exhibit a spirit that savors of brutality. It is unfortunate that the Holy Synod does not realize that Tolstoi is not merely a heretic. It ought to be easy in his case to repress the spirit of bigotry, for he is something more than a heterodox moralist. Indeed his system of morality is the least important of the expressions of his tremendous genius. In religion he is the most illogical of dreamers. So illogical is he that students of his works affirm it to be impossible to reconcile Tolstoi the great artist with Tolstoi the almost venomous reformer. They find it difficult to belive that a man who has drawn in noble outlines the dignity of the daily life of humanity regards as sinful the divine act of procreation by which that dignity is renewed from age to age. They cannot understand how a poet in prose who has preached the essential kinship of a human being with the landscape in which he lives can deny so elemental a virtue as that which attaches a man to his native land. Tolstoi the noisy moralist will be soon forgotten, but Tolstoi, the hero of Sebastapol, the author of "Childhood and Youth," of "War and Peace" and "Anna Karenin," will live through the ages. If the Holy Synod possessed the sense of humor it would have joined in the celebration of the birthday of the extraordinary literary genius and refrained from reminding the people of a certain work in which he sets forth his religious ideas and tells us that the Church is still permitted a formal existence simply because men dread to shatter the chalice that once contained the water of life.

Why Our Ships Are Obsolete

It is an axiom of domestic science that a woman cannot meddle in the affairs of her neighbors and take good care of her home. On the same principle the President of the United States cannot satisfactorily perform the duties of his office while spending his time trying to regulate the universe. And of this principle we are having exemplification every day. Preoccupied as we were for several years with Mr. Roosevelt's vague reformatory projects of a socialistic nature, his sensational assaults on divers individuals and the innumerable illusions of his overheated brain, we had no time to observe how he was managing the governmental departments under his supervision, but now we are seeing things of vital interest. Released from a blinding obsession, our perceptive faculties in good working order, we are able to give attention to matters in which it is worth while to interest ourselves. No longer in thrall to a once persuasive personality, surfeited with moonshine and lofty pretension, and with our imaginations well in hand, we have turned from our examination of the feet of clay to see what has been done by the anointed ones in and about the shrine of the idol. And we find that in no department has there been worse mismanagement than in the one which we supposed was producing the finest results. We refer of course to the Navy Department. There is doubtless some exaggeration in the charges that have been made by Upton Sinclair and others, but we are fairly certain of enough to be justified in asserting that our navy has been crippled by the gross inefficiency of the officials at Washington. We know, for example, that attention was not promptly given to many defects in our ships concerning which reports were made by line officers. Furthermore we know that as early as 1903 Lieutenant Poundstone submitted plans for a battleship of the Dreadnought type which were pigeonholed in the construction bureau, and that such ships as the Idaho and Mississippi, already obsolete, were built instead. We know that the British government adopted plans similar to Poundstone's and that we are now about to imitate what has become a British type of battleship. At the time Poundstone submitted his plans he demonstrated the virtues of his design in articles written for the Naval Institute, but he failed to impress President Roosevelt's envious and ignorant bureaucrats. Obviously our Navy Department has not been giving the country the best service available. The fact is that under the administration of the noisiest and most tempestuous of Presidents, during the passionate moral activities of the greatest reformer and scolder in history, inefficiency has brought humiliation on the country. A famous Scotch engineer, Mr. Weir of Glasgow, said to an interviewer in Washington last week that ten years ago the accomplishments of American engineers were attracting a great deal of attention in England; that quite a few things of importance were learned from engineers on this side of the water, but that conditions have changed and that now the English engineers are more advanced than ours. Apparently it is true that our engineers have not kept pace with those of England, but the truth is we do not employ available talent. It is notorious that petty jealousy rules our Navy Department as it rules other departments, and this is the natural consequence of having as Chief Executive a man predisposed to the type of personality of which jealousy and kindred qualities are characteristic.

The Hetch-Hetchy Project

Conscious as we are of the risk we run in appearing to lack deference, we have, nevertheless, the temerity to confess to a grievous misdoubt of the advisability of spending more time in straightening out the complications which involve the Hetch-Hetchy Valley water project. These complications, which are too numerous and elaborate for brief recapitulation, germinate and fructify at such a rate that their final extinguishment is a consummation which seems not only remote but impossible. If we could be sure that in the course of the next few years all obstacles would be removed and all the water needed available, the project would seem worth while, but no such prospect appeals to our patience. At best we must consent to certain restrictions. It is proposed that we should spend many millions of dollars on a water system which shall be subject to the control of the authorities at Washington, and with the understanding that the farmers of a big irrigation district shall have the first call on the supply. Day by day the futility of the scheme grows apace, while the fatuity becomes more and more apparent. It is not uncomplimentary to the intelligence of the Hon. James D. Phelan, the apostle of Hetch-Hetchy, to say that his pet project is far from alluring. Ordinarily, when Mr. Phelan is not influenced by sentiment or animated by personal prejudice; when his conduct is motived in nothing but his passion for money, his judgment in matters of business policy is pretty sound. He is a shrewd business man and can drive an excellent as well as a hard bargain. But so far as this proposed water system is concerned it is not impossible to impeach Mr. Phelan's disinterestedness. He may not be trying to make any money out of it, but he certainly is trying to prevent others from making money. What is the secret of Mr. Phelan's zeal? Is he inspired only with civic patriotism? We have seen it reported that certain water rights and properties which the city is trying to purchase are those which Mr. Phelan, when Mayor of San Francisco, took options on in his own name. How much truth there is in this we do not know. But whatever significance it may hold it has no bearing on the present discussion. The point that we wish to make is this,—that the question of the feasibility of the Hetch-Hetchy project concerns Mr. Phelan less than the circumvention of some of his enemies who are prepared to supply this city with a water system at a nice profit to themselves. There is no cloud on their title, no restrictions are to be imposed in the event of the purchase of the property, and there are no complications to be straightened out, but the owners of this property have snubbed Mr. Phelan in his clubs and they have denounced him for his charlatanism and Mr. Phelan, who is in a chronic state of splenetic upheaval, must have his revenge. The explanation seems incredible. It will not be accepted by the average sagacious reader. The avererage sagacious reader knows better, but he doesn't know Mr. Phelan. Not to know Mr. Phelan is to be in ignorance of a most remarkable psychological phenomenon. To know Mr. Phelan, the dictator of the present municipal dispensation, is to be able to understand why San Francisco must continue for a while to drink a populous water and pay high insurance rates. And it is to be able to understand why San Francisco is so different from Los Angeles, a city which has no such persuasive personality as Mr. Phelan. Our allusion to Los Angeles is not made with the expectation of impressing this incorrigible community with the advantage of unity of aim and purpose, but only to direct attention to an edifying object lesson. Years after we began talking about a water system it occurred to the people of Los Angeles that they should have one and one is already in sight. But of course Los Angeles is a degenerate city. It will be remembered that H. E. Huntington, who was driven out of San Francisco by the Phelanites, has been permitted to add millions to his fortune in the sinful city of the plain. Besides, somebody has made money out of the water rights purchased by Los Angeles. The virtuous citizens of this city will let nobody make anything but political capital out of them, and Jimmy is their darling.

Only the Shouting of the Captains

Surprise is expressed in some quarters because the current political campaign is comparatively "apathetic." Barring a somewhat heated and vituperative attack by Mr. Hearst on Mr. Bryan, the temperature of the "situation" may be accurately described as "normal." Everything seems to be proceeding in a courteous and gentlemanlike manner. The orator on the stump is neither viewing with alarm nor pointing with pride. He goes about his business of convincing his fellow citizens that his candidate for the Presidency is the better man, in a business-like way; he argues calmly and he declaims dispassionately; he trusts something to the intelligence of his hearers, and he leaves something to their discretion. It is not really an "apathetic" campaign; it is a reasonable campaign. In truth there is nothing in the contest to excite either pride or alarm; the "issues" are ordinary business questions subject rather to parliamentary debate than to vociferous and declamatory appeal to human prejudice; the candidates are plain American citizens variously accused of such mild offenses as that one is Mr. Roosevelt's personal candidate, that another is a twice-defeated candidate, that a third is a Socialist, a fourth a Populist, a fifth a Prohibitionist, and a sixth the personal candidate of Mr. Hearst. That about completes the tale. If any candidates have been lost in the shuffle they are unimportant. None of these accusations will win or lose a vote in the final count. Even if we believed that Mr. Taft is "Roosevelt's man," we would not vote against him; and the fact that Mr. Bryan has been twice defeated for the Presidency would not injure his prestige in our estimation. As for the others, the utter improbability of their election disposes of them as factors in the horoscopes cast by the political prophets.

KING SOLOMON'S HALL
Fillmore Street, near Sutter, San Francisco

All of which is indicative that the mass of the American people has returned to reason; that public opinion has decided, temporarily at least, that States may be saved without clamorous appeals to the passions of men; that platforms are only guide-posts at the crossroads of politics; that a great deal of stump oratory is only auditory evidence that the hired man is earning his wage. All of us have long since settled in our minds what candidate we will support with our votes; and we are sure that even if the candidate whom we favor is beaten at the polls the country will be absolutely safe. We are not "apathetic," we are only confident. This confidence is not inspired by the candidates or by the principles which those candidates are supposed to represent. It is a confidence in ourselves. We face no "crisis" in this election, and our outlook upon the future is sufficiently clear to assure us that there are no rocks, reefs or shoals in the course of our ship of State. What matters it then, in the final analysis, who is at the helm? The crew is competent to handle the craft even if the skipper loses his grip. Consequently we are not wasting sleep in worriment over who shall be the successful candidate. Business is pretty good and promises to be better. Wages are fair and the toiler is contented. We are at peace with the outlander and he is sending his money to us for our products and merchandise. Perhaps we are a little too peaceful; perhaps it would be better for the national stamina if there were a "war cloud" or two on our "horizon;" peace, if too prolonged, breeds cankers. It is not necessary to seek farther for more subtle definition of the attitude of the average American citizen in this campaign. He is wholly satisfied with conditions as they exist and as he believes they will exist after the election, and he is more disturbed over the affairs of his immediate neighborhood than he is with the affairs of the nation. The antics of the graft prosecution are of greater moment to the San Franciscan just now than is the possibility that William Jennings Bryan may be the next President of the United States, or that if William Howard Taft is elected the tariff will not be revised to suit us; over in Oakland there is vastly more interest manifested in the feud between Mayor Mott and Councilman Jackson than in the quarrel between Mr. Hearst and the Iroquois Club of this city; a constable, or maybe two constables, are to be elected in Eden township or Milpitas, and that fierce controversy absorbs all the spare venom and wrath of the citizenry of those communities, leaving little or none to be expended on each other for national purposes. Some of our newspapers may prance around in "the political arena," with perceptible affectation of partisan "fealty," but that is the usual way with most newspapers, and the American citizen is no longer deceived by the cavortings of his favorite journal—he was never deceived by the champing and stamping of the newspaper that he refuses to "take" but never fails to read. The campaign is not one of "apathy" but it is "quieter" than any other in our history, and is thus qualified to be specially recorded in our yet-to-be-written annals. Otherwise it is, in its present complexion, scarcely worthy of a marginal note on the page of our Book of Destiny.

The Evils of Total Abstinence

Dr. Hugo Munsterberg of Harvard, one of the most learned of living psychologists, is of the opinion that this country is "drying up emotionally," and that there is a connection between this phenomenon and the national prejudice against alcohol as a beverage. Dr. Munsterberg is probably the most efficient of all the allies of the Demon, for his espousal of the cause is inspired with solicitude for the interests of the intellectual arts, and he says that history shows that intemperance and abstinence alike work against the highest interests of civilization and are destructive of those emotions which are susceptible to esthetic influences. Now, singularly enough, the noisiest of the Prohibitionists are women who think they represent the educated and enlightened class and Philistines of the pulpit who have proudly established themselves in a frail cosmos of fake culture. Many of them are leaders of new thought movements. All are more or less prominent in village lyceums. When they learn that so distinguished a scientist as Dr. Munsterberg says that Prohibition is the creed of presumptuous ignoramuses many of them will apostasize over night. If the brewers, distillers and the vintners, the cultivators of the vine and the growers of hops, are still fearful of the Puritanism that has been threatening to banish alcohol from the land they should backfire the enemy with homilies on the evils of Philistinism and warnings against the menace to intellectual progress. Should it become generally known that the feminine morality and sexless virtue advocated by the bigots of the Prohibition propaganda betoken a narrow and an uncultivated mind, the membership of the W. C. T. U. would fall off one-half by reason of the resignations of the dear creatures who are performing ludicrous antics on the front doorsteps of culture. But to return to Dr. Munsterberg: "Puritanism," he says, "has held back the real American spirit of artistic creation in fine arts and music and drama." Dr. Munsterberg preaches the necessity of stimulated life. He says that if we do not have alcohol we must have a substitute and a less harmful substitute is hard to find. The American nation, he says, would never have achieved its world work if it had eschewed liquor. There is no more dangerous state for a healthy, strong nation than mental monotony in the life of the masses. Dr. Munsterberg is an advocate of temperance, but total abstinence he regards as a crime that leads to barbarism. "Truly," he says, " the German, the Frenchman, the Italian, who enjoys his glass of light wine, and then wanders joyful and elated to the masterpieces of the opera, serves humanity better than the New Englander who drinks his ice water and sits satisfied at the vaudeville show, far from real art." Thus does Dr. Munsterberg point the difference between the effect of a moderate indulgence in alcohol and total abstinence. The Demon, according to the Harvard phychologist, is the patron saint of art; total abstinence is fatal to art.

Sometime

By Aloysius Coll

Sometime, when in the hushes of the night,
You grow afraid, then laugh away the fear
That on the star a step had fallen light.
Look up and smile—you cannot see or hear,
But I am near!

Sometime, when breezes stir across the wall,
You startle at the rustle of a vine
And break your lips to speak, but choke the call—
Give me the word—'tis not the columbine;
The voice is mine!

Sometime, when in the passing of a cloud
You tremble at the shadow, yet are brave,
Lift up your eyes—this thing so like a shroud
My soul is, come to pay the love you gave Back from the grave!

Some Curious Deaths

By Donald Stern

It seems like an irony of fate that Philip Lilienthal, the banker, should have been killed by the hoofs of a horse while seated in an automobile surrounded by friends. Aside from the sadness which swept over the community profoundly moved by the loss of such an upright and generally beloved man, perhaps the greatest impression was made by the sudden and unexpected taking off in the prime of his manhood and in the midst of his hospitable pleasures.

This grim certainty of Death is strikingly set forth in an eastern apologue which runs as follows: "As Solomon was one day walking with a person in Palestine, his companion said to him, with some horror. 'What ugly being is that which approaches us? I do not like his visage. Send me, I pray thee, to the remotest mountain of India.' Solomon complied, and the moment he was sent off the ugly Being arrived. 'Solomon,' said the Being, 'how came that fellow here? I was to have fetched him from the remotest mountain of India.' Solomon answered, 'Angel of Death, thou wilt find him there.'" In this skillful way the Oriental nations weave the dictum that there is no escape from Destiny. We remain as ignorant of the way in which we shall quit the world's vast stage as we were of the way in which we entered helplessly upon it. There is nothing monotonous in the way Death effects his object. He comes in as many shapes as Proteus or Vertumnus. He reveals himself in such extraordinary forms that one can almost sympathize with the weary philosopher whose sole interest in life was his curiosity as to how he should die. Biography and tradition supplies us with very various and very ample illustrations in the passing of distinguished men. Some of these legends are obviously fabrications, some of them have a groundwork of truth and some in spite of their improbability are literally true. All of them rest on authority as valid and respectable as that on which far more important events have been based.

The Greeks were past masters in finding pregnant lessons in the closing hours of their heroes. Homer, they tell us, died of a broken heart because he could not guess a riddle. As Horace had been warned by a witch that a chatterbox would be his death, so Homer had been warned by an Oracle that he would be killed by a riddle. And his day came. As he was wandering along a beach one afternoon, feeling his way with a staff in his blindness, he heard some fisherman in a boat, and unfortunately called out as any modern might have done, "What luck?" A voice from the boat replied: "As many as we caught we left behind, as many as we could not catch we carry with us." Homer puzzled over the enigma until in sheer vexation he died. Aristotle is said to have ended his days very much in the same way because he could not understand a more interesting riddle set by nature, namely, the cause of the ebbing and flowing of the Euripus. Worn out by the problem he finally threw himself into the river. Anacreon was choked with a grape seed. Sophocles is said by some to have died in this same way; others declare he died of joy at being declared victor in his last tragic contest. Euripides was torn to pieces by dogs hounded on by some women in revenge for his misogynism. Aeschylus was warned by a soothsayer that on a certain day he would be killed by something falling on his head. When the fatal day arrived Aeschylus determined to avoid all chances of danger by leaving the city and going out alone into the distant country fields where nothing could fall on him from the walls. The warmth of the day and his apparent safety in his surroundings finally reduced him to gentle slumber. As he drowsed an eagle flew overhead with a tortoise in its claws. Mistaking Aeschylus' bald head for a stone the big bird let fall the tortoise in order to break it open. The blow killed the famous writer.

Cleanthes, the Stoic, suffering from an ulcer in his mouth, and having followed the injunction of his physician to go without food for two days, calmly observed on the end of the second day that as he had now advanced so far on the road to death he did not think it worth while retracing his steps, persisted in abstinence and died of starvation. But one of the most singular ways of quitting the world was that imposed on the unfortunate philosopher Hermotimus. Like Proetus and Porphyry, he is said to have had the power of entirely separating his soul from his body. His soul winged about the air while his body, a mere corpse, reposed at home. His wife complained of such spirit trips and objected to being left alone at home with a gruesome body. Hermotimus heeded her not, and in time she sought sympathy and consolation elsewhere. The lovers found the body a haunting inconvenience, for they never were quite sure whether it was or was not animated. Accordingly they one day burnt the body and Hermotimus' spirit was left forever in its flight. Horace's life was so linked with his beloved Maecenas that it is said the poet did not long survive his patron. Pliny the elder died in the eruption of Vesuvius A. D. 79. Note book in hand the great scientist was watching nature in her throes when he was overcome with gases. Whether Moliere actually expired while supporting his character ("Le Malade Imaginaire") of a sick man who pretends to be dead, is doubtful. A Latin epitaph, written at the time, asserts it as a fact. The last quatrain has been translated as follows:

"Old, surly Death, offended at his play,
Would not be joked with in so free a way;
He, when he mimick'd him, his voice restrained,
And made him act in earnest what he feigned."

It was a curious coincidence that Falconer, the author of that fine descriptive poem, "The Shipwreck," should have perished in the casualty he so nobly describes, and that Shelley should have anticipated so accurately in poetical description his own fate: "Tomorrow I will utterly confute all that I have proved today, by strong arguments," said Simon of Tournay, at the close of a lecture in which he boasted that he had proved all the great mysteries of religion; on the morrow he was laid low by apoplexy. George Valla was hurrying form his lodgings to deliver a lecture on the probability of the immortality of the soul, but before he reached his class room he had solved the problem, for himself at least, by dropping dead. Christopher Marlowe, who at the age of twenty-nine gave every sign of being one of England's greatest dramatic poets, became mixed in a night brawl and was stabbed in the eye. Thomas May, the historian of the Long Parliament, the translator of Lucan's "Pharsalia," and one of the most versatile authors of his time, was found dead in bed with all the signs of having been strangled. He was suffocated by the strings of his night cap being tied too tightly.

Bishop Berkeley was the innocent cause of the death Malebranche. On a visit to the latter he found him suffering with inflammation of the lungs. The conversation turned on the non-existence of matter and the argument between the two philosophers waxed so hot that poor Malebranche increased his disorder and died shortly after. A singular fate befell Jean Santeul, one of the few great Latin poets produced by France. He was enjoying himself with some friends at Dijon when one of them, as a practical joke, dropped some Spanish snuff into San-

Greeting a New Author

Being in the Nature of a Half-Hearted Welcome to a Scottish Writer Who Would Try His 'Prentice Hand on the Sacred Legends of Old California Before the Native Son Writer Has Grown to Full Appreciation of the Fact that the Greenest Grass Grows at His Own Door.

By Democritus.

A new writer of Californian stories is swimming into our ken. His name is W. Drummond Norie and he is loudly advertised as something relative to all the Scottish Drummonds, claiming close kinship with Henry Drummond, the literary clergyman of Glasgow, whose "Natural Law in the Spiritual World" has done so much to sustain the faith of those who cling to the traditions of the two-and-seventy jarring sects against the assault of modern science. Neither was it omitted from Mr. Norie's brief biography that he was in lineal descent from the poet Drummond, William of Hawthornden, famous in the early seventeenth century as the author of "Tears on the Death of Meliades," "Flowers of Zion" and "Notes of Ben Jonson's Conversations." It would be an expatriate Drummond indeed who could not trace himself back to the Scottish sonneteer, preferring that ancestry rather than the Jacobite stirps of nobler strain whose belted earls of Perth were chancellors to the royal Catholic house of Stuart and plumed partisans of the Pretender.

It is a far cry from Lochleven or Lochaber and the literary kailyard of Edinburgh to the California of the pastoral period, but it is an easy, swooping flight for Author Drummond. His distinguished countryman, Robert Louis Stevenson, lived a long time on the scant crusts of Monterey, but dared not coin the legends he heard there into bawbees to pay for more crusts. The hand of the Drummond-Norie, however, may not be stayed; and the gathering dust on the old tapestries will now be shaken from the dim and fading pictures; the new broom made in Glasgow will sweep the cobwebs from the beamed roofs of the old adobes; an alien key will unlock the oaken chests of the long dead dons to reveal the secrets of our first families; a pen better fitted to write the history of the cavaliers who fought under Bonnie Dundee will scrawl strange words to travesty the only poetry that California may claim as her literary and historical birthright.

I am not quarreling with W. Drummond Norie. I find no fault with him for rushing in where our own Gertrude Atherton dared to tread—where a score of lesser folk have stumbled and blundered and floundered so absurdly. The land is open to any invader, and its conquest is to him who has the power. Let W. Drummond Norie walk awhile in El Dorado; sit awhile beneath the mission arbors; stay awhile with the hospitable grandee; sup awhile with the stately senoras; ride awhile with the gay cabelleros; dance awhile with the dark-eyed senoritas; beguiling himself the while with the vain notion that he is breathing the "atmosphere" of Old California, that he is listening to the lilting melody of the strings that measured the pace of bolero or moved the flying feet in the gladsome fury of the fierce fandango. And while he tarries I will harbor neither sorrow nor anger against him; I will not exult over his discomfiture nor reproach him for his temerity. I will only smile and bid him a long farewell.

I observe that W. Drummond Norie gets his "atmosphere," which is a very important adjunct of the Californian story, by the old, old trick of mixing his Spanish with his English: "Buenos dias, senores! Would you not like a basket for your peaches?" "It was a long journey in those days, hijo mio." "Ah, Felipe! hermano mio!" This is "atmosphere." Mrs. Atherton's "atmosphere" is more pronounced. It is a heavier "atmosphere" oppressively redolent of such epithets as "maldito!" "caramba!" "madre de Dios!" "valgame Dios!" and "sin verguenza!" Rendered into plain, straightforward English these phrases gain strength but lose their musical quality and utterly destroy the writer's "atmosphere." W. Drummond Norie, however, dissipates his "atmosphere" in quite another manner. He uses the explanatory parenthesis, thus: "Muy poco (very little)"; one of the pobladores (founders) of the Pueblo de San Jose"; "a beautiful novia (fiance)"; which last I presume to be a printer's error for "fiancee," but why mix Spanish "atmosphere" with French climate when the comprehensive English word "betrothed" or the tender word "sweetheart" would have served so much better without spoiling the "atmosphere" in the slightest? Or why explain it at all? I take no exception to Mr. Norie's bad Spanish in "Mucho gracias, senorita," for not every printer is up in the Spanish language and all printers are proverbially prone to typographical errors as the sparks to fly upward; of course Mr. Norie wrote it "Muchos gracias, senorita," which is also bad Spanish for "Muchas gracias, senorita," but perhaps Mr. Norie in his effort to put "atmosphere" into his story compelled his Spaniard to speak ungrammatically—Dickens, Thackeray, Walter Scott and Ian McLaren used the same device in their "atmosphere.' Mr. Norie's perversion of a Spanish phrase in a story for English readers may be a subtle refinement of the trick, that is all. Pursuing this line of superficial criticism, I wonder whether Mr. Norie would deem it necessary to append a glossary to one of his stories of Scottish life, if he should ever think it worth his while to write about something with which he ought to be more familiar than he is with the old regime in California. And suppose that Gertrude Atherton should write a story about Athens or Sparta—would she "atmosphere" it with Greek expletives and phrases printed in Greek types? I wonder.

Much as I dislike to review Mr. Norie censoriously, I must express my resentment against his footnotes, indicated in the text of his story by numbers in parenthesis. "The wide valley from Alviso to San Ysidro (1)," writes Mr. Norie, and in a footnote "(1) Now known as Gilroy"; "the Presidio of Yerba Buena (2)," which he says at the bottom of the column is "(2) The old name of San Francisco"; "the Pueblo de San Jose de Guadalupe (3)," compelling the reader to pause in his wild career through Mr. Norie's story until he has learned from the tail-end vade mecum that the Pueblo de San Jose de Guadalupe is "(3) The old name of San Jose." Californians will accuse Mr. Norie of insulting their intelligence by this method of explaining himself as he goes along and those who are not Californians, chancing to read one of these Norie California stories will puzzle themselves to ascertain whether Mr. Norie is writing a geography or a romance.

The oratorical protagonist in the story now under vivisection announces in the opening sentence of his recital that his speech is "halting" and that he has not "a very good mastery of your difficult Americano tongue." Thereafter the speaker's narrative flows freely enough, especially when it is assisted by the unmistakable English of Mr. Norie—English as good as any that is printed in the Strand Magazine or Temple Bar. In truth I suspect that when Mr. Norie is in the throes and convulsions of composition he forgets his "atmosphere" and unconsciously substitutes that of his own, his native land.

I have not said all that I could say in critical review of this new writer of Californian stories; nor all that I

Mother Love

By Konstanza Hodoseh

At last the soft light of the slowly rising sun crept through the window. The young woman arose from her bed and glanced out upon the streets, where already there was some movement of life, and then up at the sky, which was slowly changing from the night to the day. But her eyes were very tired, she had not slept the entire night and perhaps never again would she know the infinite restfulness of quiet slumber.

Her present situation resolved itself into a half dozen spectres, some mute, some menacing. There were the past, the present and the future, and all three seemed to be arising and breathing like the sullen waves of a great and boundless sea upon no shore of which shines any lighthouse sending out rays of hope, comfort or guidance. The past has left its impress, but the horizon of the future is covered with a mass of dark clouds, and it is doubtful whether the rising sun will pierce and disperse them. She went to the mirror and arranged her hair, and then, holding her breath, opened the door of the neighboring room very quietly. There he was sleeping, and in a cradle, close by the bed, slept the little one. The curtains were drawn over the windows, and it was as quiet in this room as in a church.

She—she is the one who had sinned! In a moment of madness she had violated the sanctity of this retreat.

How was it possible, how could she have done it? Had she not loved them? She could have gotten down upon her knees and taken the man's hand in hers, and begged him to tell her if he had ever loved her. From the very beginning she had doubted it. Young, gay and beautiful, she had found nothing in his strong, quiet nature to answer her own.

"How will you get along together?" inquired her aunts and relatives and the long line of male friends who had been attracted by her wit, her beauty, her wavy black hair and sparkling eyes.

Sometimes she cried because he seemed to neglect her, did not give her an answering smile, did not give her that which would have made her so happy.

One day he, her husband, had lost all patience and had scolded her mercilessly. The household matters were not properly carried on, she was away from the home too much and when in her own house received too many visits. She handed over the care of their child to a servant. It was a flood of cruel reproaches, under the burden of which she finally broke down.

Well, society was right. She and her husband did not understand each other; they were distinctly different natures; they were incompatible temperaments; they could never live together.

So they must part.

Could she really leave him? Many other arms were reaching out toward her to protect her, and passionate voices were calling to her.

"You are a martyr!" said one. "He does not love you!" whispered another. "I understand you!" murmured a third. "I worship you," came from another side. And then all the voices seemed to blend into one word: "Come! Come! Come!"

Her husband had consented to the separation and she had chosen one from the crowd of her admirers.

Well, and now? In the next room were the trunks which had been packed. She was going, she must go.

She was a stranger in this little paradise, she was a thief who had broken in. What was she waiting for?

Yet she remained there, rooted to the spot, gazing wide eyed at the walls, the pictures, all that the room showed to the eye, and memory brought up much of the past. Where was her youth, where the love which had vanished like the snows of yester-year?

With a low sigh, which was more like the perfume wafted from the rose than a sound issuing from lips, the child awoke and stretched out its arms.

"Why, where have you been sleeping, mamma?" The boy wound his arms around her neck and pressed her face close to his breast.

And now there came to her dry, feverish eyes, which could not close the night before, a new look; the tears welled up, and then the child said again:

"You must not leave me."

A light seemed to break upon her. "No! No! I will never go away, I will never leave you, God help me." In that cry her whole heart, her whole soul went out to him.

Here was the treasure of her dream, here was her youth; her love, her ambition, her strength to live were here, in her arms. Now she saw clearly her duty, and more than that, the only possible way to happiness. Hereafter she will be humble and obedient, she will beg for forgiveness and indulgence. Oh, no; he can never drive her away. That would be impossible. He might go away if he wanted to, but leave to her the innocent child that she might hold it in her arms and hear its sweet voice, the sweetest music in the whole world.

Suddenly she heard a nervous cough, and, startled, she lifted up her eyes. Her husband had awakened. He said no word, but gazed at her with a look of bitter hatred. She took the child up in her arms and carried it to the sofa in the corner and began to dress it, but his gray, reproachful eyes burned into her soul like barbed arrows. She began to tremble and pressed the child convulsively to her.

The man rose and came toward her threateningly: "No more scenes! You wanted to go, now—go!"

She laid the child down on the sofa and lifted her hands to him pleadingly: "Forgive me!"

He looked at her with infinite contempt: "Do you dare—"

"Listen, if there is in your soul one spark of feeling left—"

He interrupted her with a burst of sarcastic laughter.

"Enough, enough. There is none left, not one single spark."

For a few moments he paced back and forth, and then he stopped and drawing himself proudly up, looked at the clock.

"The train leaves at six o'clock; you have only fifteen minutes to catch it. See, the carriage is at the door; your lover is waiting for you."

Mechanically, as if impelled by some hypnotic force, she rose and went into the next room. She put on her traveling cloak and hat. Then she looked into the mirror. Whose was the pale, drawn face that looked out upon her? She passed her hand over her features questioningly, to make quite sure. No, it was not her face, it was not her hair, it was not her hand.

"It is the face of a corpse," she said to herself.

As she went down the steps she turned for an instant and held out her hands.

"I go," she murmured, "but my soul remains here!"

In the room above the child stood in the very place where his mother had left him, as if turned to stone. There was something terrible in his look. The father went over to him and lifted him in his arms, but the child screamed and tore at his face and beard with its little fingers.

General Otis's Affairs

According to the gossip of local newspaperdom, General Harrison Gray Otis, the militant editor of the Los Angeles Times was recently on a still hunt in this section of the country for a managing editor, one with the ability to take full charge of his big daily and relieve him of all but the ultimate responsibilities of newspaper ownership. This news was followed by the report that the aged veteran of two wars and innumerable political and industrial scraps had come to the conclusion that he had almost exhausted his energies and that it was the part of wisdom to forego henceforth the vanities of life and in the serenity of a calm retreat husband his vitality and crown a life of labor with an age of ease. The author of this report has a very inaccurate conception of General Otis's disposition. Though General Otis has reached the threescore year and ten mark age sits lightly on his shoulders. He went East a short time ago to undergo a very serious operation, but he had no dread misgivings. Nay, on the very eve of his departure his fancy, so 'twas said, was as that of exuberant young manhood in the season when the sap beings to stir and the fruit trees shed their filmy blossoms. In short, to General Otis is attributed the very serious intention of linking his fortune with another's, and the bavardes of the press have been getting ready for him.

An Old-Fashioned Judge

Apparently Judge Coffey entertains an old-fashioned prejudice against passing upon the question of his own impartiality. This question was raised the other day in the litigation which grew out of the collapse of the California Safe Deposit and Trust Company. It was contended that as Judge Coffey's nephew had a small sum of money on deposit in the wrecked bank the judge would not be able to preserve a neutral state of mind at the trial. This was rather a far-fetched challenge, but Judge Coffey took it seriously and referred it to another department for consideration. Apparently Judge Coffey does not think it advisable to be guided by the precedents recently established by certain exalted representatives of the judiciary, who affirm their absolute immunity from bias and prejudice, and who are so far removed from the atmosphere of natural passion that they are inaccessible to all emotion. A judge of this kind can try his mother or his mother-in-law with the same degree of fairness.

A Hint From Judge Seawell

Another one of the old-fashioned kind of judges is Judge Seawell, who reveres the traditions and is a stickler for the ethics of his profession. The other day he was asked to postpone a civil case in his department on account of the illness of one of the attorneys who was suffering from nervous prostration. This attorney is one of the assistants in Mr. Langdon's office and is paid by the taxpayers to serve them in the capacity of public prosecutor. Judge Seawell opened his eyes in astonishment when he heard the illness of an Assistant District Attorney pleaded as a pretext for postponing a civil case. "If the District Attorney's office doesn't keep out of civil practice," said Judge Seawell, "there will be some pretty serious cases of nervous prostration hereabouts."

The Barbers After Livernash

Despite the vindictiveness of the Barbers' Union the Labor Day festivities were not marred perceptibly. The miscreants of the Barbers' Union, nursing a prejudice against the Hon. E. J. Livernash, undertook to disturb the harmony of the occasion by means of a protest against the orator of the day. They objected to Mr. Livernash on the ground that his friendship for labor was only skin-deep, and they charged him with rank treachery and hypocrisy. Somebody went so far as to issue a scurrillous circular containing a summary of the queer events that have given some color to Mr. Livernash's checkered career. Most of the things recited therein Mr. Livernash himself must long since have forgotten, for it is incredible that any man conscious of the record which gives a curious distinction to this young patriot's past would deliberately presume to persuade the union men of San Francisco that he is deserving of their warm esteem. In justice to Mr. Livernash it should be said that the only grievance which the Barbers' Union has against him is due to his reported partiality toward scab shops. And it should also be said that the Labor Council overruled the protest. Of course no other action was to have been expected, for the Labor Council, thanks to Mayor Taylor, is at present subject to the dictation of the Hon. Michael Casey, the sometime henchman of Eugene Schmitz and now the handy man of the current dispensation. Casey and Livernash are now of the same political coterie, but as neither has greater facility than the other in switching allegiance what relation they will bear to each other a year from now God only knows.

A Sad Necessity

Dr. Jordan's address to the students of Stanford at the opening of the semester was timely, pertinent and apposite. This is saying more than it should be necessary to say, for Dr. Jordan's remarks were chiefly admonitory and wholly personal. It is unfortunate that the words of warning and advice were warranted by sad and painful experience. I hope that what Dr. Jordan said to the students of Stanford on this occasion will be recorded in the oratorical annals of the school as mere aftermath of a harvest of collegiate wild oats, and that on no future occasion will it be necessary to refer to it in sorrow or anger—sorrow because the words were unheeded, anger because the counsel and warning were scorned by the student body as mere by-words uttered to fill the measure of a freshman's moral need and in nowise adequate to assuage a sophomoric thirst or to put a check on the wild desires of a junior undergraduate cavorting in coltish abandon in the red-light district of Menlo or wasting his youthful substance in the tenderloin of the metropolis, where wine is a mocker, strong drink raging and all things pernicious.

Lenity for Academic Heresies

Stanford undergraduates have certainly not behaved with proper respect to their alma mater. Many of them have indeed disgraced their college by the publicity and the notoriety of their riotous living. It is to be hoped sincerely that hereafter the coltish contingent of the student body will submit without resistance to the curb that the faculty proposes to put upon them. But, in all candor it must be said that the reformation of Stanford should not stop at the personal morals of the students; it should reach to the inner council of the governing body there to regenerate the academic policies of the institution. If the students of Stanford have been too broad in their notions of what constitutes a collegiate career, the faculty and trustees of Stanford have been too narrow in their view of what should be given to the students in the way of pabulum for mental digestion. It is possible that the "heresies" banned from Stanford are really as rank as they have been painted by Dr. Jordan and his colleagues on the board of trustees; but that fact, if it is a fact, should not militate against them as subjects for discussion within the walls of a real university, and it would not so militate in any university where all knowledge is welcomed if for no other purpose than to prove it futile and fallacious. Heresy, in the modern definition is no longer a crime to be eradicated by the rack or to be wrenched from the heretic with forceps, like a bad tooth. The heresies of yesterday are the truths of today; and what was heterodox last week may be absolutely orthodox tomorrow. The world moves in spite of Galileo's enforced recantation, and intellectual mankind has learned to read the story of creation in the rocks rather than in the pages of Genesis. Dr. Jordan may think he is right in forbidding the preaching of economic and philosophical heresies at Stanford, but if he is wrong he will have much to answer for in the final accounting when the great ledger is posted in which will be recorded the debits and credits of those who have assisted or retarded the intellectual progress of the world. Therefore I call for more light at Stanford; another dash of lycopodium on the torch of learning; another cruet of oil for the lamp of knowledge—and less scrutiny of the label on the powder box and the trademark blown in the bottle.

Berkeley's Broader Policies

Dr. Wheeler of the University of California sets an excellent example for Dr. Jordan of Stanford. When Socialist Debs was arriving in California like a big red wagon, the Socialists were timid of Dr. Wheeler and were almost afraid to ask his permission to let their red republican speak in Berkeley. It was suggested that as Debs was a sort of popular curiosity it would be necessary to exhibit him in a big place to accommodate the throng that would gather to hear him perform, and that when he was billed to abash the echoes of Berkeley he should speak his piece from the stage of the Greek theater. Some doubt was expressed by the more modest and retiring members of the communistic cult of which Debs is the standard bearer, as to the advisability of risking a scornful answer from the President of the State University, and fearing this answer an ordinary skating rink was hired. As soon as Dr. Wheeler heard the Socialists were thus fearful of his Greek style of speech, he relieved their embarrassment by informing them that Debs was completely welcome to thunder his propaganda against the stone walls of the amphitheater. The Greek theater belonged to the people of California; the Socialists, however misguided in their political notions, were citizens of California; ergo, the Socialists had as much right as other citizens of California to preach their political doctrines in the Greek theater. The light has come to Berkeley. The logic of Berkeley, in this instance, is after the best manner of Whateley and Mill and it reaches its conclusions by direct and irreducible terms. I suppose that Dr. Wheeler is quite as "set" in some of his preconceived ideas concerning the proper conduct of all secular affairs as is Dr. Jordan; but I know that while a political heretic of the Debs variety could not preach his heresy within a league of Palo Alto he is permitted to shout himself hoarse under the very walls of the Berkeley Sorbonne. This is one of the differences between a liberal and an illiberal education. And my word for it, the students of Berkeley will receive no contamination from Debs the Socialist, because they have seen him and heard him; while there is every reason to fear that the students of Stanford will eventually yield to the temptation of many of the heresies that have been excommunicated from that narrow intellectual environment.

Griggs—"Surely. One in which you succeed in breaking away from the girl without becoming engaged to her."

Lawlor the Infallible

Judge Lawlor rejected a juror the other day because, in his opinion, the citizen was "unfit to sit in the jury box." Glory be! Upon what meat has this Caesar of the bench been feeding lately that he has grown so fat? The only evidence of unfitness adduced in the course of a discussion of the talesman's sufficiency was the fact that he is a saloonkeeper, and even the punctilious and fastidious Heney hastened to protest that he would accept an honest saloonkeeper as a juryman in any case with which he was concerned as readily as he would accept an honest merchant. Which compels repetition of the good old Irish phrase of wonderment. Is honesty really a passport to the favor of Mr. Heney in the selection of jurymen? Quien sabe. But let me return to my Lawlor mutton. The upright judge offered no testimony to sustain his judgment of the juror's mental, moral or political capacity for jury duty. Swatted with a demand for his reason for rejecting the proposed juror without examination as to his qualification, this Danielette fell back on the code with a dull, sickening thud. It was his judicial prerogative, and that must settle the matter. Further than that, he refused to answer the questions of the attorney for the defense, which sets the precedent that a witness may refuse to answer questions upon other excuse than one which gives him the privilege of declining to incriminate himself or clothe himself with shame in the eyes of his fellow citizens. Judge Lawlor is a jurist who knows the law, go to, and knowing dares maintain his knowledge in the hearing of all the world. Judge Lawlor robes himself with discretion as with ermine, and no juror may sit in his court unless he fits the Lawlor standard. He derives this discretion from the code and the section on which he rests his right to challenge jurors from the bench is so broad that, like charity, it may cover a vast multitude of personal prejudices. Judge Lawlor is answerable to no man for his opinion of his fellowmen. Within the purview of his juridical function he is as infallible as a Roman pontiff, as omnipotent as thunder-hurling Jove, as omniscent as Argus of the myriad eyes. It is no longer necessary that attorneys for the prosecution or the defense serving the bar of Judge Lawlor's court shall pry into the minds of potential jurors to ascertain their fitness to sit in subordinate judgment upon the issues in controversy—Judge Lawlor will attend to all that. His second sight beats the telepathy of the Cumaean sibyl a mile, and his gift of prophecy plays a full hand against the oracles of Delphi and Dodona whose bob-tail flush and pair of deuces are a disgrace to the sure-thing methods of the immortal gods. Jurors in Judge Lawlor's court will hereafter look closely to their moral equipment and their mental qualifications. If on due inspection they find that they are in the slightest degree below the possible standard that Judge Lawlor will require; if they feel in their heart of hearts that they are unfit to sit beneath the drippings of a Lawlor sanctuary of justice; if they discover a spot, a stain or a tarnish on their consciences, or if they find a screw loose in their thinking apparatus, let them abandon hope as they enter the presence of the all-seeing eye. The Men That Made History

By the recent death of Rear-Admiral Henry Glass I am reminded that there is not one officer on the active list today who commanded any of the vessels at the battle of Manila Bay or any of the battleships which were in the fight against Admiral Cervera's vessels at Santiago. Four of the commanders of the ships which were at Manila are dead. They are Captain Charles V. Gridley of the Olympia, Captain Frank Wildes of the Boston, Commander E. P. Wood of the Petrel and Captain D. M. Hodgson of the revenue cutter McCulloch. Of the others Captain N. M. Dyer, who commanded the Baltimore, is a rear-admiral on the retired list; Commander Asa Walker of the Concord and Captain J. B. Coghlan of the Raleigh are also on the retired list as rear-admirals. The chief actor in the historic event at Manila Bay, Commander George Dewey, also is among those on the retired list. Another of the men on the retired list is Benjamin P. Lamberton, who though not in command of a vessel at Manila Bay, is entitled to as much renown as those that were. He had been assigned to the command of the Boston, but had not yet relieved Captain Wildes. The latter strongly objected to being relieved on the eve of a battle, and Commander Lamberton served as chief of staff to Commodore Dewey. Of those who figured at Santiago, Admiral Sampson, commander of the fleet, Captain Philip of the Texas, and Captain Taylor of the Indiana are not now among the living. Commodore Schley, Captain Clark of the Oregon, Captain Cook of the Brooklyn, Captain Chadwick of the New York, Captain Higginson of the Massachusetts and Captain Evans of the Iowa are all rear-admirals on the retired list. The commander of one of the vessels that performed so valiantly in the attack on Cervera's fleet is still on the active list of the navy. I refer to Rear-Admiral Richard Wainwright, now with the Atlantic battleship fleet. He was executive officer of the Maine when that vessel was destroyed and as commander of the Gloucester he received the surrender of the Spanish admiral.

Hotel Building in Oakland

Oakland is demanding another hotel. It appears that shortly after the disaster of 1906 when San Francisco poured her homeless thousands into the city across the bay the bankers of Oakland agreed among themselves that the greatest need of the city was an up-to-date hotel. Discussion developed the opinion that such an enterprise would be a profitable investment; and finally it was decided to build the hotel upon the corporation plan, the bankers taking the bulk of the stock, such citizens as desired to get better interest on their money than they were receiving from the banks being permitted to "come in on the ground floor." Subscriptions were opened, the company was duly organized with the bankers in control and Warren D. English installed as secretary. Great activity was manifest during several months and a site covering an entire block was cleared preparatory to the excavation for the edifice, the plans of which included some of the most elaborate features. And there it ended, apparently. Recently, however, the local newspapers have taken up the matter and are urging, with all their power of rhetoric and publicity, that the bankers shall complete what they so bravely began. Citizens who have no direct interest in the enterprise are being interviewed and are unanimous in the opinion that this hotel is the immediate and crying need of the city. Every argument that can be offered on behalf of a hotel in any community is uttered by those who are asked to talk on the subject. For the moment the arrested hotel overshadows the harbor bond proposition, and that is something wondrous strange, for the harbor bonds have rent the city into factions that out-Montague and out-Capulet the contending families of Verona. No definite reason is assigned by the bankers for not building their hotel, but it is probable that they are not now so sanguine of the profit of such an investment as they were when the city was overcrowded with persons willing to pay any price for a night's lodging. Perhaps these Oakland bankers on maturer consideration came to the conclusion that such a hotel as they originally contemplated would not make an adequate return on the investment. Bankers are prone to this sort of afterthought, and it is not likely that the Oakland banker is a conspicuous exception to the general of their thrifty tribe. In this view of the proposition why should the bankers of Oakland be compelled to build their hotel? Oakland is seemingly well supplied with hotels, and some of them seem to be comfortably filled. Nobody that goes to Oakland for a night's lodging is turned away because of a lack of accommodation. Moreover, there are many more hotels in Oakland now than there were before the San Francisco fire forced the prices of lodgings to the roofs of the lodging houses.

When Bankers Balk

Cities are not the result of hotels, but hotels are the consequence of a metropolitan demand. Hotels are a business proposition pure and simple. If Oakland is big enough for another hotel it will be built. Hotel builders are not philanthropists. Perhaps those Oakland bankers have counted the cost and revenue of the Oakland hotels already in operation and perhaps the balance sheet of their calculation is not in accordance with their shrewd notions of profit and loss. It is possible, too, that these bankers are only delaying the consummation of their enterprise until Oakland shall have grown up to the magnitude of the hotel they intend to build. It is up to Oakland, therefore, to grow up to the bankers' idea of a bankers' hotel. In any event it will be futile to attempt to compel the bankers to build a hotel that will not pay at least 10 per cent on such an investment. And it will be equally futile to attempt to compel the bankers to build a hotel if they do not want to build one. Bankers are not in the hotel business for the mere amusement of housing tourists and transients and charging the victims all the traffic will bear; they must be assured that the tourists and transients will clamor for accommodations and that they will stand for a bankers' rate in a bankers' caravansary. This assurance, evidently, Oakland is unable to give at present; and that is probably one of the main reasons why the bankers of Oakland have ceased to build their hotel. The bankers of Oakland unquestionably know their Oakland better than the citizens of Oakland know their bankers. In the meantime San Francisco is prepared to welcome any and all Oaklanders who are dissatisfied with their home hotel accommodations, or who desire to abide the building of the Oakland bankers' hotel, in some other place than Oakland.

The Undoing of Bernardo Shorb

Some women are born sirens and men listen to them only to their own undoing as Bernardo Shorb discovered very recently. As all the cotillon set knows young Shorb has been suffering a whirlwind of domestic trouble ever since his marriage, last July, to Miss Elizabeth Sheehan, the daughter of John R. Sheehan, the contractor. Mrs. Shorb White Buck warned the young people and the Sheehan family of this likely outcome of the marriage, but the wedding somehow got beyond her control. Young Shorb was without a position, had no certain income and was only nineteen years old, nearly six years younger than his bride. The honeymoon lasted barely twenty-six days and then the flat refuasl of Papa Sheehan to pay for an expensive automobile purchased by the young groom divided the couple and Mrs. Shorb went to Burlingame to live with her father. All kinds of suits from damages to divorce have been hanging in the air ever since. For a time thereafter Bernardo was pursued by a persistent hoodoo that wrote up everything he did in flamboyant style for the newspapers; his brothers and sisters fell in for their share and to escape it all he took to the woods. Last week he ventured back from the country to the Shorb residence in order to replenish his wardrobe. The Sheehan skirmishers quickly learned of his presence and a hurried council was at once called to devise a plan of serving a divorce summons on him. It was known that he was in a state of high nervous tension over the matter and would drop out of sight on the least suspicion that such proceedings were in the air. Adroit and very delicate methods were accordingly planned to lure him into the fatal net.

The Song of the Siren

As the story goes a society girl who may not have known of the full purpose of the deception was selected to lure the unsuspecting young husband. Through some clever work in ringing up the members of the Shorb domicile she finally got in touch with the wary and sensitive Bernardo. After cooing expressions of her deepest sympathy for him in his unfortunate domestic plight she insidiously purred that a very dear friend of hers was, oh, so anxious to meet him just for a moment. The curious Bernardo began to preen under the charm of her magnetic voice and her alluring sympathies. After smoothly playing with the unsuspecting victim for a awhile she delicately disclosed the fact that the mysterious lady so anxious to meet him was Elizabeth, his own wife, and that, well, more than one person was so sorry for the present cruel separation, and if he would call at Elizabeth's apartments, very quietly, by slipping up the back stairs, so as not to be observed by any wandering irate parent, well, something, some great and joyful surprise might be accomplished—she wouldn't promise what. But being a loving husband he could easily guess the likely outcome.

And the Family Said—

At the designated hour Bernardo slipped quietly up the back stairs as directed and softly tapped on the door. It was opened by a man in waiting who smilingly handed him the summons in the divorce case. When Young Shorb returned home and recounted his surprising adventure to the family they expressed great indignation at the trick played upon him. The infatuated young husband was loyal to his wife, however, and stoutly declared his belief that she had no hand in the plot.

"Is he a Christian Scientist?"
"Well, his wife has to take a great many absent treatments."

The renomination of Governor Hughes, despite the hostility of the bosses, was a great triumph, but the distinguished reformer, according to an occasional correspondent who writes me from New York, has anything but a cinch on his office. "Throughout the State," says my correspondent, "but especially here in the city, there is a feeling of revolt against all reformers. Widespread is the sentiment that there has been too much muckraking, too much agitation, too much denunciation and condemnation, too much demagogy and too little sincerity, and Governor Hughes will suffer from being identified with a cause that has been brought into disrepute by its prophets. Hughes is a sincere man, but the impression prevails that he is narrow-minded. His attitude toward race track gambling is pointed to as evidence of a puritanical spirit and New York has no love for the traditions that have come down from the Mayflower. The average New Yorker cannot see any difference between betting on a race and betting on the price of steel. Betting is the great absorbing pastime and business of the metropolis. And in a city where a comfortable laxity of morals is deemed essential to a realization of the end of existence, where most everybody you meet believes that life goes down with a better grace 'foaming in full body over a precipice than miserably struggling to an end in sandy deltas,' it seems the limit of absurdity to roll the eyes in holy horror at the thought of making a bet on a horse race. Track betting is the feeblest form of demoralization in this great city. Hughes will have to rely on the rural districts, but in the agricultural regions of New York the men interested in racing have very extensive interests; and even farmers have been known to hearken to the voice of personal interest. I hear that Boss Murphy is thinking of nominating Lieutenant-Governor Lewis Stuyvesant Chanler against Hughes. If he should do so the contest will be a spirited one."

Chanler's Strength

And Chanler has been nominated. He will surely prove a strong candidate, for he is one of the most popular men in New York. He was elected to his present position by more than 5,000 plurality in 1906, when the head of the ticket, William R. Hearst, was defeated by more than 50,000. One of the elements of his strength is that he is both an up-State and a New York City man. The career of Chanler has been an interesting one. A student of international law in the University of Cambridge, a lawyer practising in the criminal courts of New York, an earnest follower of Parnell in Ireland on the Home Rule question, a director of a Parnell paper in Dublin, a local supervisor in Poughkeepsie, founder of the Red Hook Chanler Democratic Club in Dutchess County, Lieutenant-Governor of New York—these are some of the roles in which he has figured, although he is not yet forty years old.

His Interesting Career

Last spring Chanler was spoken of for the Presidential nomination. Undoubtedly he would have gotten second place on the Democratic national ticket if the New York leaders had not determined to accept nothing from the Denver convention. That he is destined to loom large in the public eye before long is a prediction which his remarkable personality justifies. Born at Newport in 1869 he entered the Columbia College law school when he was nineteen years old, and after his graduation went to England, where he took a course in international law at Cambridge. There he figured as something of an orator, and was elected president of the Cambridge University Union. It is said that he was the first American to receive the honor. When he returned to America he surprised his family and friends by going into the practice of criminal law. He explained later that he was interested in criminology, and that he desired, moreover, to help persons accused of crimes and unable to pay counsel. His career in the Criminal Courts building was a stormy one. As a legal associate of Charles W. Brooke he took part in many famous trials, notably the Dr. Meyer and Dr. Buchanan poisoning cases. Most of his clients were men who could not pay legal fees. He sought interesting cases, and the more desperate the prospects of a client the more he liked the case, because it afforded an opportunity to pursue his study of criminology. It is related that on more than one occasion he defended an accused man without fee, got his acquittal, and afterward gave him money to begin life anew. In 1896 he went over to Ireland, where he saw a good chance for a fight. At that time the Parnellite party was making a struggle for home rule, and Chanler at once offered his services. He made several hundred speeches in different parts of Ireland in the next four years, and became popular with the Irish. When the old Land League went out of existence he joined the movement to form the Irish Independent League, and helped to establish the Irish Independent, the organ of the league. Soon afterward the home rule trouble was settled, as far as it could be settled, and as there was no more fighting in sight, Chanler returned to New York and resumed his practice.

No Graft In This?

According to Mayor Taylor a grave ethical wrong was committed by the "civic patriot section" of the Board of Supervisors in accepting the bid of E. H. Rollins & Sons for city bonds. This is a very mild way of characterizing the action of the gallant young henchmen of the Phelan-Spreckels sanhedrim. Obviously the successful bidders were favored bidders. A favored bidder is one who has an advantage over competitors. This advantage is in the form of restrictions placed on competitors from which the favored bidder is exempt. When this advantage exists there cannot be legitimate bidding. We are told that it was to the advantage of the city to award the bond contract to Rollins & Sons. How do we know that a higher bid would not have been offered by some other firm if all bidders had known that a blanket bid was acceptable? How do we know that the specifications were not drawn with a view to deceiving all the competitors of Rollins & Sons?

A Call for Shortridge

Though Samuel M. Shortridge is not an orator without honor and appreciation in his own home the probability is that were he to accept the invitation of the Republican National Campaign Committee and reveal his eloquence to Eastern audiences we should concede him a loftier pinnacle than the one he occupies. Our fear of being extravagant in our appraisement of home talent is in proportion to our familiarity with its achievements, and though we pretend to have confidence in our own judgment the foreign verdict is always accepted as final. For that reason it would be interesting to have the Henry Clay of the California bar invade the territory of Beveridge, Black and Cochran and observe the effect of his noble and commanding style of eloquence. Mr. Shortridge is one of the most cultured of our spellbinders. While his eloquence fascinates by its polish and its purity, he is not without the knack of swaying the emotions with the dexterous sleights of verbal ingenuity. During the campaign that preceded the primary election he proved himself a master of ridicule when with vehement sarcasm, but no bitterness of invective, he dealt politely with the prejudices of the reformers. And by the way his services were very much in demand during that campaign, for spellbinders were scarce. The warriors of the party in public jobs were discreetly holding them down, silently submitting to assault and thereby giving rise to the suspicion that they were preparing to play both ends against the middle. Caution was the watchword of the hour while on all sides character was being assaulted and reputation torn to threads. Shortridge was the only man with the nerve to defy the mud-slingers, and his friends thought it was foolish for him to do so in view of the pusillanimity of the men who fatten off the party.

Newlywed—"Say, old man, did I ever tell you about the awful fright I got on my wedding day?"

Overwed—"S-s-h-h! No man should speak that way about his wife."

Intolerance and Law

Religious toleration has made great strides in enlightened countries, but evidently there is still an abundance of bigotry in merry England, where Catholic dignataries are prohibited from carrying the Host through the public streets. It is interesting to reflect, however, that the protest against what was designated "a form of idolatry which has been illegal for 300 years," is the first outbreak of anti-Catholic bigotry that has occurred in fifty-seven years. The former explosion of fanaticism was excited by the appointment of Catholic ecclesiastics, all of them British subjects, to sees bearing English names and ostensibly representing English localities. One of the appointees was termed Archbishop of Westminster, an office that does not now exist in the Anglican church. The dignities were purely titular, recognized by no law and representing only moral authority. Under the Catholic emancipation act of 1829 the Catholics had as much right as any of the jarring sects to employ an official nomenclature of their own selection, but nevertheless vehement protests were made and the ecclesiastical titles assumption act was passed by Parliament in consequence. In a short time, however, the injustice of the Protestant protest was admitted. Since then there has been a great reduction in the number of English bigots, but the Government is yet very cautious in its handling of matters affecting the interests of the Catholic church. It was in anticipation of the Eucharistic Congress that King Edward made it known that he would not be in London during the deliberations and ceremonies of that body. Being absent from London he would not be expected to receive the Papal Legate. As for the action of the Government in heeding the protest against the carrying of the Host in a procession, it could not very well have refused to do so. While reasonable persons would not see anything objectionable in such a procession, there is a law on the statute books which forbids such outdoor demonstrations of the Catholic faith, and the people of England are more intolerant of violations of the law than of religious opinion.

What the Pope Said

In the light of what happened in England it is interesting to go back over the files and read in the despatches what was said by the Pope two weeks ago in reference to the Eucharistic Congress. His remarks were made on the occasion of a reception to eight hundred French pilgrims. Alluding to the forthcoming celebration in London he said: "While the Blessed Sacrament is exalted in Portestant England and the holy elements are honored in the streets of her metropolis, liberty is trampled under foot in France by the brutal force which serves those who have declared war upon God to their country's detriment."

We are told that no longer does he feel the need of assistance. The friends of the Archbishop will rejoice at the news of his restoration to health. When Dr. Hanna was rejected by the Congregation of the Propaganda it was then decided to instruct Archbishop Riordan to have new lists of candidates prepared by the irremovable rectors of the diocese and by the Archbishops of the United States. Whether these instructions are merely directory in their nature remains to be seen.

Phil Lilienthal

There is so much indiscriminate and perfunctory flattery in the commonplace newspaper eulogy of the lately departed prominent citizen that even when a journalist is inspired with affectionate sorrow, and wishes to express his honest convictions of praiseworthy qualities, his tribute fails to impress with the spontaneity of deep and heartfelt regrets. Conscious of this, nevertheless, I will add my testimony to what already has been given of the exalted worth of Philip Lilienthal. Much has been said of the loss to the community of so influential a citizen. But the deeper loss was that which his acquaintances have suffered, the loss of one who exercised a fascinating influence over their mind and feelings. To many it was much to have known one so beautiful of character, so kind, so gentle and considerate. In them Phil Lilienthal's death produced a chilling sense of bereavement. Phil Lilienthal was a singularly courteous gentleman and a loyal friend. He excited a personal interest among all his acquaintances. Doubtless he had enemies, but no enemy could take a just exception to the praises of his friends. The kindly and modest nature of the man will be duly honored in the quiet and unobtrusive nature of the remembrance.

Story of a Wedding Ring

To those who know the sad story of Mrs. John Davis her suicide last week in Seattle is not so much of a mystery as the newspapers are making out. Mrs. Davis was very well known here, though her parents resided in Seattle and she spent most of her time there. She was a bridesmaid at the wedding of Miss Juanita Wells and Charles Hulse and frequently visited several local families well known in social circles. On her recent return from Europe she stopped in Chicago to visit the Charles Hulses. On the round of the palmists, which she and her friends sometimes made for their amusement, it was observed that the readers always told Miss Meyer that she had an unlucky heart line. Rumor was persistent at one time that she was engaged to a well known wealthy young clubman here, a man very susceptible to the attractions of a pretty face, and Melita Meyers was the possessor of an unusually pretty face. One day he stunned her by writing that his mother objected to the match and he saw no alternative but to part from her. She sent for him and demanded a frank avowal of his position. His avowal showed her the folly of trying to recover his love, and taking off the beautiful diamond he had given her for an engagement ring she laid it on the table, saying that all was ended between them. "Oh, keep the ring," he said, "as a souvenir of our engagement."

End of Her Luckless Heart Line

All this while John Davis had been pressing his suit with Miss Meyers. He is a very wealthy man and he was far from being a niggard in proffering gifts which he thought might attract her attention towards the donor. At the same time he was able to do many strong favors in a business way for several members of her family. One day when Miss Meyers was visiting in Portland Mr. Davis slipped away to that city and the two were quietly married. In some way Seattle social life is peculiar and it is said that the young wife's experience in that field was not all that her fancy had painted. At any rate she became grieved over several things, some of them foolish perhaps, others out of all proportion to their weight, but most of all over her luckless heart line. So when the sad end came so unexpectedly, some of her friends familiar with her story were not surprised.

"I have never loved before," he said.
"Well," she replied, "I am not running a kindergarten."

Why It Is Manx and Not Mann

Right on the eve of the opening of the Hotel Mann comes the news that we are not to have a Hotel Mann at all, but a Hotel Manx instead. This is another instance of there being nothing much in a name, but many persons have been keen for an explanation. If not Mann, why Manx? For no particular reason. A hotel must have a name and Manx is as good as any. Mann is tabooed because Gustave Mann is not to be the manager as was originally contemplated. The explanation of this is that Mrs. Newton has made other arrangements and Mrs. Newton is financing this hotel enterprise. Mrs. Newton came to this city shortly after the fire, and she found that there were many persons who were very skeptical regarding the future of San Francisco. Among them was Mrs. Dora Peyser of the Majestic Hotel in Sutter street. Mrs. Peyser was eager to sell out, and Mrs. Newton being a shrewd business woman seized what she regarded as a golden opportunity. She bought the hotel at a low figure, installed Gustave Mann as manager and made slathers of money in the days when rooms were at a premium. It was generally supposed that Mr. Mann was the owner of the hotel, but as a matter of fact he worked on a salary and received a percentage of the profits. Mrs. Newton made so great a success of the hotel business that she decided to open a big hotel down town, and as a result of this decision the big building at Powell and O'Farrell streets came into existence. Just as it was approaching completion business differences arose between Mrs. Newton and Mr. Mann, the latter proposing terms that were not acceptable, and for that reason he was ousted from his position. Mr. N. M. Kellar, formerly of the Waldorf-Astoria, was engaged to manage the Manx, and Mrs. Peyser, who sold out the Majestic, was engaged to take charge of that house. A big cafe, I hear, is to be a feature of the Manx and it is to be called the "Cafe Jaulus," in honor of the well known musician who organized the splendid orchestra for Tait's cafe in the days before the fire.

Justice McFarland

Without fear of exaggeration the death of Justice Thomas B. McFarland may be pronounced a public calamity. We can ill spare from the judiciary of this State a man of his moral courage, innate love of justice and hatred of oppression. There may be on the bench men as learned in the law as was Justice McFarland, but I doubt that there is one with so consuming a passion for the safeguarding of individual liberty, so utterly contemptuous of the prejudices of the mob and so absolutely indifferent to consequences in his loyalty to his convictions. It has been said that it is easy to find a man to face batteries, but hard to find men to defy majorities. Justice McFarland was absolutely insensible to the thunders of public opinion. During his career on the bench no lawyer ever had occasion to speculate on the effect the voice of the press might have on his judgment. Obligated by his oath to dispense justice in accordance with his conception of the law, no decision rendered by him was ever inspired with consideration of the possible effect on his political career. If he harbored prejudice it was against judicial officers who mangled the law to compass the punishment of men accused of crime. A man of severe aspect and prone to vehemence and warmth in his utterances, yet he was as gentle as a child, his heart was as big as his body, and incapable of an ungenerous impulse. Justice McFarland should go down to posterity with divine honors.

Paul Could Only Blush

A well-known matron in the local smart set was visiting in Santa Barbara at the time Mrs. Elinor Glyn was there. Accompanying her was a son, a tall, strikingly handsome young chap of twenty years. One warm afternoon a group of ladies was seated about the veranda killing time in lounging chair chat. Paul appeared fresh from a plunge in the surf and looking as radiant as a young Apollo astray from Mt. Ida. He conversed with his mother for a moment and then sauntered in the direction where Mrs. Glyn was idling in the manner of one of her heroines. After contemplating the young man for a while she arose, walked towards him and putting a hand on his shoulder, she said, soulfully, "Do you know you remind me so much of my own Paul?" There were several gasps from the ladies scattered among the surrounding plants. "Paul," called his mother, sharply, "come here and take me to my room." Paul was sent back to the city on the next train, "on buisness."

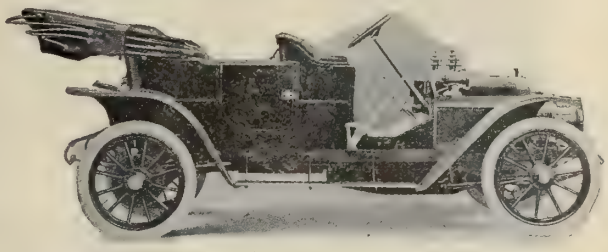
THE WEEK'S FINANCIAL OUTLOOK

By R. E. Mulcahy

The feature in New York Stock Exchange trading during the past week has been the strength shown in Reading common, the price advancing to 137½, with strong buying of it by large houses who represent strong people. The fact that Reading pays only 4 per cent seemed to receive no consideration. Upon its present dividend basis the price is too high. For a long time great things have been promised form the accumulated surplus known to be in the company's treasury. It is well known that Reading, while paying but 4 per cent has earned nearly 20 per cent; many times this stock has been put up to fancy figures in expectation of a large distribution of its suplus, and as many times have its friends been disappointed. It is estimated by those well informed that Reading earnings this year will be the largest in the history of the property. Baltimore & Ohio common has shared in the advance, selling at 101½; it is tipped for 125. Its present dividend is 5 per cent, but better things are looked for. Southern Pacific and Union Pacific continue to be the leaders; the fluctuations during the week were within a narrow range. Southern Pacific met with good selling around 110. Union Pacific Common sold ex dividend 2½ per cent on Monday. The weak feature shown in the markets came from the industrial list. American Locomotive passed the dividend on its common stock; this gave the market a jar which caused considerable selling by holders giving prices a downward tendency; however, at the decline good support appeared, resulting in a fair raily from low prices.

For the first time in many months money rates are showing an advancing tendency; this reflects withdrawals from money centers for the handling of crops. It is believed this year's crops will be handled without disturbing the money market. The large supply of gold in this country will be sufficient to meet all emergencies notwithstanding the fact that foreign countries may draw in fair quantities of our yellow metals. There has been very good buying of American securities during the past few months by foreigners; this will offset any bad effect that would otherwise be a factor with the movement of funds. The political situation remains unchanged. Taft first, last, and all the time. Morgan is again at home. Hill and Harriman are in New York. The powers are again on the firing line and no great disaster may be looked for. Lawson continues to jolly the public, expecting them to give him a billion dollars to hold. Who will hold Lawson? He is now talking big prices for American Smelting common; while the company may be doing fairly well, it is well known the common stock represents no intrinsic value. The present price of silver is not a bull card for this particular stock; later on the company may be able to show some foundation under its common stock, but at present something more than manipulation will have to prove it. Distilling securities have had their troubles; rumors are freely circulated to the effect that the company will have to pass its dividend; the decline in the stock would indicate that there is more than a rumor to the matter. The temperance wave going over the country is showing its effect in many like securities. The declining tendency shown in copper metal of late has had its effects in the copper stocks. It may be that the production of copper is too rapid for the timid demand and consumption.



The cereal markets continue very strong; home and foreign demand for wheat, flour and corn is brisk. France will, it is reported, require 50,000,000 bushels of wheat from America this year in addition to the requirements of other countries; this will mean there will be drawn from our wheat supply 200,000,000 bushels at a cost of that many dollars. It is an open question whether so much wheat can be spared; these conditions fully explain the high price of wheat. Foreigners will require 500,000,000 bushels of American corn. If the price remains around 70 cents per bushel, it will mean $350,000,000 for American farmers; these two items alone will throw our credit balance into large figures. The coming crop year will show our credit balance the greatest ever known and by such a large margin that it will surprise the most sanguine.

We will have little set backs before election, but they will be only momentary; there can be but one result. Conditions are improving against great odds, and will keep going forward for two years or more to come. The local outlook shows every sign of betterment. You hear less and less every day of hard times.

Plans for the De Young Wedding

The latest letters from the de Youngs are dated from the Hotel Ritz, Paris. Miss Helen writes that the family are doing very little traveling this year as their time is crowded with the selection of two trousseaux and the execution of shopping commissions for friends. They will return in October and Constance will be married to Joseph Tobin in November, the marriage of Helen and George Cameron following. Friends are looking forward eagerly to seeing all the lovely things which these two fortunate sisters have purchased abroad. They will be the most elaborate trousseaux brought to San Francisco in many a season.

Barred the Dog

San Francisco society did not go to the bowwows until long after New York had emancipated itself from children and succumbed to canine fascinations. But of late dogs have come into their own in our smart set, and whereas they used to be confined to the home and garden, nowadays the shopping district seldom shows fashionable young girls and matrons without a dog in leash, or cuddled in the crook of the arm. Mrs. Lansing Kellogg has a bull dog who is sufficiently experienced to match samples, and whenever one meets the mistress in a shop the bulldog is sure to be a by-product of the excursion. Shoppers are getting so accustomed to every sort of dog, from the insipid watch fob variety to the ferocious species that they do not create a stir in the stores, but as yet they are barred from the smart cafes. The other day Mrs. Kellogg and some friends sailed toward the Fairmont dining room, with the inevitable bulldog in leash. At the door a polite put positive attendant barred the dog. Mrs. Kellogg was indignant, but her "feed me, tolerate my dog" attitude did not bend the rules and she was forced to take her beloved bull into the parcel room and tie him up until after luncheon. So instead of crumbs from an epicure's table the dog was forced to chew on the hems of overcoats that might be just as expensive but are not satisfying.

Cupid as Chauffeur

The few intimate chums of Fred Meyerstein are watching his course in society just now with a mixture of interest and envy. Rich, young and handsome, and with a dash of captivating ways that make him a welcome addition to any company, he is much sought after. Just now he is on a merry motor trip with Judge and Mrs. Kerrigan. The Kerrigans know swarms of pretty girls and some of the prettiest, chaperoned by Cupid and the Kerrigans, are the specially attractive features of the car. Bets are two to one in clubdom that no ordinary heart-free bachelor can ride in that motor car on its present trip without returning engaged. Hence designing mammas in town are watching the outcome with many misgivings and if young Meyerstein does not return fettered with garlands of roses and manacled to a wedding ring they have several little plans of their own to net him this winter.

The Callaghan Divorce

Though the sign of the divorce court was pretty clearly defined in the horoscope of the Dan Callaghans the social set that knows them had its curiosity aroused when the news leaked out that the law of the land had dissolved the decree of the church. This curiosity was the natural result of the secrecy which attended the divorce proceedings in San Jose. And the circumstance that the custody of the little children was awarded to the father tended to sharpen curiosity. But as the Callaghans wisely refrained from engaging in a contest nobody has a right to know any more than was disclosed in the divorce court, and that was hardly enough to inspire the purveyors of sensations on the daily press. However, the gossips will talk it over for nine days or so and in all probability to their own satisfaction they will fashion a narrative on a thread of incident running back to the days of the honeymoon. The gossips in this instance are exceptionally numerous owing to the extensive ramifications of the Callaghan family. Even in Australia this Callaghan divorce will be the subject of discussion, for Mrs. Callaghan lived in that country for many years. She is the daughter of Captain Michael Carey, who was commodore of the Oceanic Company's fleet of steamers, one of the most popular men that ever guided a vessel in Pacific waters. And his daughter Violet Carey was one of the most attractive belles that ever came out of the land of the kangaroo. Numerous were the suitors for her hand, and the winning of it was considered an enviable achievement. Dan Callaghan is a son of the Daniel Callaghan who was once President of the First National Bank and therefore he has an interest in the property at the gore of Market and McAllister streets, which was occupied by the Callaghan building at the time of the earthquake. One of the Callaghan girls married Captain Roby, lieutenant commander of the South Dakota and another is the wife of J. V. de Laveaga, the attorney. Arthur Callaghan, a brother of Daniel, married Edna Van Wyck, daughter of the H. L. Van Wycks. He is a mining engineer and lives in Salt Lake.

Will Be a Quiet Church Wedding

Mrs. Linda Bryan and Mr. Prentiss Hale have chosen St. Stephen's Episcopal Church for their marriage, but there will be no attendants and even the idea of a reception following the marriage has been abandoned. Their latest plan is to occupy the house in which Mrs. Bryan has been living after their honeymoon, until a more suitable home can be found. The house really belongs to Mrs. Bryan's mother, who practically lives the year round at Mazatlan, and so placed her home at the disposal of her daughter.

On the Wrong Side of Gentility

In spite of the fact that the Walter Martin house at Burlingame is "on the wrong side of gentility," as they say down there, Mrs. Eleanor Martin has spent most of the summer with her son's family. The Walter Martins at one time planned an elaborate house, but instead they bought an unpretentious one on the ragged edge of the fashionable quarter. Perhaps after a summer there Mrs. Eleanor will have a rush of generosity and build to suit the Martin social position.

Will Winter in Town

The Van Sicklens talk of closing their Alameda home and spending part of the winter in San Francisco. Miss Dorothy Van Sicklen, who made her debut at the Fairmont last winter, is much to her mother's delight, fond of society, and it is for her sake that the move is contemplated. The Van Sicklens are the wealthiest people in Alameda but until the debut of Miss Dorothy did not take their place in society, as Miss Hilda, the older sister, has shown a decided lack of interest in the frivolings of the smart set. She went through the usual process of a debutante-in-the-making, which consists of a year at a New York finishing school, a year or two abroad and then a formal presentation to society. But after making her bow Miss Hilda retired and has devoted herself entirely to church work.

Motoring 'Neath the Honeymoon

Mr. and Mrs. Robert Hayes Smith, who are touring Europe write that they made a motor trip over the British Isles in ten days and are now on the continent. They will return in November and make their home at the Fairmont Hotel. The Washington Dodges are jaunting over the continent with them.

Given a Merry Farewell

The informal tea given last Saturday by Miss Laura Smith for the two Stones, Harriet and Marian, who left on Wednesday for New York to enter Miss Spence's school, was a very jolly affair. Some of the girls came early and brought dainty bits of sewing with them; one group formed a table of bridge, others rendered music. The comfortable Vail house on the corner of Webster and Green streets which the Smiths have taken for the winter is excellently adapted to entertaining and will probably be the scene of many such occasions during the season, as Miss Smith is a popular girl as well as an exceedingly pretty one. Since her return from Europe recently, following her school days in Washington, she has been at her home in San Anselmo. Among the guests Saturday was Natalie Hunt, who accompanied the Stones to New York, Floride Hunt, the three Brewers, the Misses Marian Marvin, Eleanor Landers, Alma Thane, Aloise Gebhardt, Dolly McGavin, Eliza McMullen, Amalia Simpson, Miss Wood, Mrs. Hugo Mansfeldt and Mrs. J. J. Johnston.

A Prettily Appointed Tea

Mrs. Harold Law was hostess of a prettily appointed tea for Miss Irene Van Arsdale last Friday. Mrs. Law's sister, Miss Elyse Schultz, assisted in receiving the guests, among whom were the Misses Marian Lally, Helen Gray, Marjorie Shepard, Aloise Gebhardt, Amalia Simpson, Lillian Van Vorst, Florence Booth, Helen Sullivan, Zella Gibson, Clarisse Lyons, Hazel Ricks, Mrs. Hugo Mansfeldt, Mrs. Fred Holt and Mrs. Baker.

The Circus Set

In the dispatches of Tuesday was the news that Mrs. Astor on retiring from the social whirl on account of age took occasion to swat the vulgarians of the smart set who are constantly forcing themselves into the limelight. She referred especially to the women who give their entertainments under a circus tent rather than in a drawing room. While there will be no misapprehension in Newport respecting the women whom Mrs. Astor has in mind at this distance from the stormcentre very few will be able to interpret her vague allusion. For the benefit of the uninformed I will explain that there is in Newport what is known as the circus set, the moving spirits of which are known sometimes as the Immortal Trio and sometimes as the Three Twins. One of this distinguished trio is none other than our own exuberant "Tessie," widow of Hermann Oelrichs, and therefore the Circus Set is not without local interest. Mrs. Oelrichs' associates in this breezy combination of talent are the Mesdames Oliver Belmont and Stuyvesant Fish. These three women have done more than all the other representatives of Newport to create and fix the popular impression of the bizarre tastes of our plutocracy.

Our Perennial Leader

By a curious coincidence the news of Mrs. Astor's retirement from the social whirl on account of age reached San Francisco on the very day that the stork converted our own venerable leader, Mrs. Eleanor Martin, into a great-grandmother. It was on that day that a daughter was born to the Oscar Coopers, but the incident instead of abating the perennial enthusiasm of Mrs. Martin made her buoyant spirits more volatile than ever. Age cannot wither nor great-grandchildren diminish Mrs. Martin's zest for social gaiety. When a function holds out till the wee sma' hours Mrs. Martin's eyelids droop, but by no other sign does she ever indicate that the willingness of the spirit cannot overcome the weakness of the flesh. Next to Lillian Russell Mrs. Martin is the youngest woman for her age in the country.

Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Walsh, accompanied by Miss Elizabeth Newhall, motored up from Santa Barbara during the week for a few days' stay at the Hotel. Allan Dunn, who is to play Orlando in the forthcoming performance of "As You Like It," on the Del Monte lawn, came down for a day's rehearsal last week. Other guests at the Hotel over the week-end were Mr. and Mrs. Frank Mathieu, Mr. and Mrs. Rudolph V. Whiting, Mr. and Mrs. Cuyler Lee, Mr. and Mrs. H. MacDonald Spencer and Everett N. Bee.

Passing of An Esteemed Woman

After an illness of over a year, Mrs. William F. Herrin, wife of the chief counsel of the Southern Pacific Company, passed quietly away in her home at Broadway and Scott street, last Tuesday morning. In addition to her family she leaves a very large circle of friends to mourn her loss. Mrs. Herrin was born near Downieville, Sierra County, in this State, forty-nine years ago. Her mother survives her and is living in this city. Her father was an active member of the law firm of Stewart, Van Clief & Herrin, and for a time was associate justice of the State Supreme Court. Her marriage to Mr. Herrin took place in this city twenty-seven years ago. She left three children, Miss Kathryn and Miss Alice, and a son, William V., who is now attending an eastern college.

Union of Southern Families

The marriage of Miss Nannie Crittenden Van Wyck, daughter of Mrs. Sidney M. Van Wyck, Sr., and Rev. Austin Brockenborough Chinn will take place at Trinity church in this city on October the 5th. The bride belongs to one of the oldest of our Southern families. Her mother, Miss Nannie Crittenden, daughter of the late A. P. Crittenden, the well-known lawyer, was a belle of the exclusive set in early-day society. Mrs. Van Wyck is president of the Jefferson Davis Chapter of the Daughters of the Confederacy, and was one of the first organizers of the Southern Chapters in this city. The prospective bride is a typical Southern girl, gentle, refined and cultured, exceedingly well fitted for the position as a clergyman's wife. Dr. Crittenden Van Wyck and Sidney M. Van Wyck are brothers of the bride. Mrs. W. A. Peters, wife of the well known attorney of Seattle, is an only sister. The late Miss Laura Van Wyck, who was lost on the Valencia a couple of years ago, was also a member of this family. Rev. Mr. Chinn is a member of the prominent family of Chinns, old and aristocratic people of Virginia. He is now in Virginia and will arrive here about October 3rd. Two years ago he visited this city, being the guest of the Van Wycks. After the marriage Rev. Mr. Chinn and his bride will reside in Menlo Park, where he has been appointed pastor of Trinity Episcopal Church.

the favor with which the game is regarded here on the Coast. It will be remembered that nine years ago Del Monte brought the first quartet of easterners to play on the Coast. At the time the importation made a strong impression among the local tennis fraternity; they have never forgotten the progressive spirit shown by the Hotel people. To this visit of the Eastern men, San Francisco really owes the splendid courts which are now to be found in Golden Gate park. After the tournament was over the champions were shown about the city. As they drove through Golden Gate park one of them asked, "Where are the tennis courts in the Park?" Upon being told there were no public courts in the parks of San Francisco, he expressed his surprise, saying that in the East all the cities had such public grounds. As a result of this suggestion several of the tennis men got together and pressure was brought to bear on the Park Commissioners to secure them. Walter Martin was on the Park Board at that time and to him must be given a large share of the credit for effecting this movement. At the present time there are eleven excellent courts in the Golden Gate park, for which indirectly Del Monte is responsible. The play which has just been concluded at Del Monte has been remarkably clean and clever. It was notable, not alone for the aggregation of talented men and women who took part in the games, but for the large and constant attendance of local society people.

Wedding at Pacific Grove

From Pacific Grove I hear that a wedding of much interest to residents there took place last Saturday when Miss Augusta A. Nahl became the wife of Professor W. F. Allen, the well known scientist. The bride is a daughter of A. Nahl and is well known and popular in the Grove. Professor Allen is connected with the Seaside Grove laboratory. After a two weeks' honeymoon at the Colorado Canyon the couple will reside at Pacific Grove in a cozy little bungalow near the water's edge. Mr. and Mrs. E. M. C. Whitney, accompanied by Miss L. D. Weis, motored to the Hotel from San Francisco last week and put in a few days very pleaasntly taking the Seventeen Mile Drive and the trip to the Rancho Del Monte. Others who made the trip to the Grove in the same delightful fashion were Mrs. F. E. Wells, Miss Fay Chapman, Miss Abbie Oliphant, Miss Florence Treadwell and Miss Hazel Burpee. Mrs. Jessie Dean Moore of Berkeley, Miss Ruby A. Moore and Miss Margaret Bradley are there for an indefinite stay, as are also Mr. and Mrs. Peter Bohl of Sacramento, Dr. and Mrs. G. B. Tested von Moltke's Coolness in Battle

In his reminiscences now being published in McClure's Magazine, Carl Schurz relates the following anecdote told him by Bismarck, in which the latter explained how he tested von Moltke's coolness during "the anxious moment" in the decisive battle of Kroniggratz: "It was the moment on the decision of which the fate of an empire depended. What would have become of us if we had lost that battle? Squadrons of cavalry, all mixed up, hussars, dragoons, uhlans, were streaming by the spot where the King, Moltke and myself stood, and although we had calculated that the Crown Prince might long have appeared behind the Austrian rear, there was no sign of the Crown Prince. Things began to look ominous. I confess I felt not a little nervous. I looked at Moltke, who sat quietly on his horse and did not seem to be disturbed by what was going on around us. I thought I would test whether he was really as calm as he appeared. I rode up to him and asked him whether I might offer him a cigar, since I noticed that he was not smoking. He replied that he would be glad if I had one to spare. I presented to him my open case in which there were only two cigars, one a very good Havana, and the other of rather poor quality. Moltke looked at them and even handled them with great attention, in order to ascertain their relative value, and then with slow deliberation chose the Havana. "Very good,' he said composedly. This assured me very much. I thought, if Moltke can bestow so much time and attention upon the choice between two cigars, things cannot be so very bad. Indeed, a few minutes later we heard the Crown Prince's guns, we observed unsteady and confused movements on the Austrian positions, and the battle was won."

Infatuations of an Imperial Family

From the time Emperor Nicholas I. of Russion made no secret of his passion for the great French actress Rachel the infatuation of members of the Russian imperial family for ladies of the stage has been a tradition. The Emperor's son, Grand Duke Nicholas Nicholaievitch, followed his father's example by falling in love with an actress for whom he furnished a magnificent house opposite his own palace. Grand Duke Nicholas Constantinovitch has been banished from the imperial court for the last thirty years owing to his infatuation for an American comedy actress. Grand Duke Alexis, once commander-in-chief of the Russian fleet, lives in Paris, inseparable from an opera singer, and the admiration of the present Czar Nicholas II., before he ascended the throne, for a beautiful ballet dancer, has not been forgotten. The escapades of the Grand Duke Boris, who took an entire company of chorus girls with him to his headquarters in the Far East during the war with Japan, are still remembered. Of the sons of the Czar's uncle Valdimir, the youngest, Andrei Valdimirovitch, is credited with possessing great influence over his imperial cousin. Until now he has been regarded as a model young man, and he alone appeared to be proof against the seductions of the stage. But it is now reported from St. Petersburg that he has fallen head over ears in love with Mlle. Sirischinska, a dark-eyed beauty of the Imperial Theatre. It is even said that he has seriously offered her marriage, but Mlle. Sirischinska declines to give up her profession. The Czar is much incensed at his cousin's lapse from grace and has ordered him to take up his quarters for a year at Irkustk, Siberia, in the hope that a temporary exile may cool the young man's ardor.

The Valencia Theatre

The opening of the Valencia Theatre last Saturday night under the management of Walter Hoff Seeley, was an event of more than theatrical interest. It was an event of some importance to the whole city. The new theater is a symbol of the progressive spirit born in the flames that destroyed San Francisco. It is proof of the expansion of the city and of confidence in its growth, for this theatre, while it appeals to the patronage of the whole city is identified with a district which has become more populous than most of the towns of the State. That it will be supported there need be no doubt, for it is evident that the management has no intention of relying on sentiment. Aside from the attractiveness of the theatre itself, a handsome, substantial building, designed for the purpose to which it has been dedicated, and of exceptional completeness in equipment, the talent on its stage should appeal to the judgment and taste of theatre-goers. The management has rounded up a very strong stock company, which is appearing to exceptional advantage in "The Great Ruby," a melodrama of the first class. It is a play that abounds in sensational elements, and it affords fine opportunities for scenic effects and powerful acting. On the opening night of the production nerves were very much in evidence, for everybody was keyed up to the highest pitch. Nevertheless the play went smooth enough and the performers won their way to the heart of an audience that packed the theatre. It was a gala occasion. The actors were beflowered, the management was applauded, felicitous speeches were made by J. Charles Green and Mr. Seeley, and there were gratulations for all the people on the stage. Robert Warwick, the leading man, was sized up as a winner; the leading lady, Willette Kershaw, was pronounced a lady of temperament; Mrs. James Gamble, who made her debut as "Peggy Munroe" was satisfying even to the skeptical and of course Frank McGlynn performed up to the expectations of everybody.

—Thomas Lambert.

The Answer to "The Girl Question"

Being filled with girls who know their business "The Girl Question" at the Van Ness Theatre answers itself. To be sure there are several men in it who are above the usual musical comedy order but they follow the regular rule laid down for men in the ordinary walks of life and end by marrying girls who have selected them for husbands. Like all girl questions the play is a rather dizzy dream of feminine loveliness, clouded with haunting songs, airy dancing, lively repartee, captivating novelties, droll situations and the dash of indispensable sentiment that appears when a man invades the Garden of Eden, meets a hammock girl at a summer resort, or gets mixed with the action in an up-to-date musical comedy. As in all such productions good stage management, good principals and a dashing, swinging chorus are the mainstays of success. "The Girl Question" possesses the most of these. Especially is it strong in that particular line that tickles the palate of the jaded musical comedy devotee—novelties. Paul Nicholson is a show in himself and he distributes his stock of wares with an easy grace and prodigality that bespeaks the capitalist in his line. He has a smooth, easy, unctuous and versatile way that would wriggle the funny bone in any frivolous production. Carl George is a capital second to him. Some very clever character work is interpolated into the piece, particularly that contributed by Henrietta Tedre. Marguerite de Von, as the cashier in the restaurant, is a fairy on her feet and jewel enough in her position to warrant the rush of custom that overflows the place. The character of the company shines forth in the "imitation" number, a variant of the familiar stunt offered by the vaudeville artists. The management in this instance has taken advantage of the versatility of the company and presents the idea with so much originality and with such distinct cleverness as to make it the hit of the bill.

Excellent Concerts by the Pasmore Trio

Genuine enthusiasm greeted the Pasmore Trio, the Misses Mary, Susanne and Dorothy, at their first concert of the season, this week, in Century Hall. Their ensemble met unstinted praise and showed the players in pure sympathy with one another. They played with an assurance and exquisite delicacy surprising in such youthful performers. Tschaikowsky's trio in A minor was the hit of the program in dramatic interest, musical intensity, delicacy of color in phrasing and pure tonal qualities. The work of Miss Dorothy on the cello gives promise of a very bright future. These accomplished musicians will remain here only during the winter, after which they expect to give concerts abroad. There will be two more concerts by the Pasmore Trio, November 17th and December 15th.

New Plays of the Season

Two new plays were produced in New York this week, "The Call of the North" and "Love Watches." In "The Call of the North" Mr. Broadhurst has departed from Stewart Edward White's story which he has dramatized, and has used it as a foundation rather than as the complete material for his work. He has retained the principal characters, but has condensed the central episode until the time of action occupies but a couple of days. Robert Edeson plays the part of Ned Trent, a free trader, who has come into difficulties with the Hudson Bay Company, and has been caught trespassing for the third time, when the action of the play opens. As a punishment the factor of the post sentences him to start upon "la longue traverse," which the audience has previously heard described as a means the factor has of getting rid of undesirable persons by sending them out into the wilds without a rifle or provisions. Trent at first seeks a means of escape by making love to the factor's daughter, but realizes the unworthiness of this, and attempts to escape unaided. He is captured and brought before the factor, and in the stormy scene which follows the entire story is laid bare—his identity and Virginia's love for him. The atmosphere of the piece is that of the North. The trading post is separated from civilization by six hundred miles of wilderness, and the people of the play are Indians and voyageurs, attaches of the post, and a few visitors from more civilized parts of the world.

"Love Watches," in which Billie Burke is appearing at the Lyceum Theatre, gets its title from a statement of the father of the girl whose story the play tells, "that a woman can be safeguarded only by love, and that this love watches over her constantly." The piece deals with the heart story of a young girl who marries the man of her choice and then discovers a third party in the person of a young widow. She plans her own original way of revenge and succeeds neatly.

Another Week of "The Music Master"

A third week of David Warfield in "The Music Master" is made imperative by public demand. Not since the advance sale opened has there been a moment during office hours when the Alcazar box office has experienced respite from the demand for seats, and it doubtful that even eight more performances of "The Music Master" will satisfy the desires of those who have not yet witnessed the play. With these extra performances of "The Music Master" it will not be necesasry to patronize the ticket scalpers against whom David Belasco's representative and the Alcazar management have made such a strong fight. For every evening and afternoon performance next week good seats can be purchased at the box office. Before Mr. Warfield closes his engagement at the Alcazar he will certainly appear in his great creation of Wes Bigelow, in "A Grand Army Man," a role in which he shines as strongly as in "The Music Master."

"The Toreador" at the Princess

Ferris Hartman will begin the sixth week of his phenomenally successful season at the Princess Theatre next Monday night in the famous musical play, "The Toreador," which will be remembered as one of the greatest hits in the history of the Tivoli. It abounds in sparkling and pretty music and witty and amusing dialogue and affords a splendid opportunity for the display of picturesque scenery and costumes which the management is determined to exhaust. Mr. Hartman will maintain his great popularity as Tommy Gigg, a cockney tiger, who is mistaken for the famous Toreador Carajola, and is in consequence involved in the most ludicrous predicaments. Arthur Cunningham, as the real Toreador, will repeat one of his greatest lyric and dramatic triumphs. Melvin Stokes, who is already firmly established in popular favor will be excellently cast as Augustus Trail of the British Consulate, and Wallace Brownlow will be in his element as the Governor of Villaya. Jack Tobie will cleverly burlesque Creatore as the bandmaster of the Lunatic Asylum Band and Walter de Leon will have the chance to distinguish himself as Sir Archibald Slackett, Bart. Christina Nielsen will have the lively and engaging role of Dora Selby. Miss Nielsen is beginning to show the results of the valuable training she had under Mackenzie Gordon. Sybil Page will be Dora Selby's friend Nancy Staunton. Sarah Edwards should be well suited as the wealthy widow, Mrs. Walton Hoppings, and Zoe Barnett will have plenty of Carmenesque opportunity as Donna Therese. Walter Catlet as Pettifer, a dealer in wild animals, and Fred Kavanagh as Rinaldo, a Carlist, will complete what bids fair to be an exceptionally fine cast. "The Fortune Teller" will be produced for the last times this Sunday afternoon and evening.

Gifted Artists Open Studio Here

Donald Maclean and Henri Etlin, who arrived here from Paris three months ago, have established themselves permanently in San Francisco by opening a studio of singing and piano together at 1613 Green street. The place is beautifully furnished with old stained glass windows and antique furniture from Paris. Mr. Maclean is a San Franciscan, a well known graduate of Stanford who went to Paris three years ago to study under Jean de Rezske and his assistant, Oscar Seagle. Mr. Maclean possesses a baritone voice of unusual quality which has attained a high degree of cultivation under the marvelous de Rezske method. He is the only de Rezske pupil in San Francisco. Henry Etlin, the pianist, is the winner of a first prize Paris Conservatoire and is the favorite pupil of the celebrated pianist Diemer. He has also studied under Mathias, one of the last of the pupils of Chopin, and it is no doubt to this fact that Mr. Etlin owes to a great extent his wonderful interpretation of that composer. Mr. Etlin and Mr. Maclean have both appeared abroad with great success. It is the intention of Mr. Maclean and Mr. Etlin to give a concert at Christian Science Hall on October 3d. Mr. Etlin will play for the first time in San Francisco the dance of Salome by Richard Strauss.

La Vigne Concert

Noe Joseph La Vigne, a distinguished dramatic baritone, will give a concert at Lyric Hall, Thursday evening, October 1. He will be heard in selections from Rigoletto, l'Pagliacci and Faust and also in a number of French, Italian and English songs. He will be assisted by Betty Scholtz, violinist, and a graduate of the Berlin Conservatory of Music. Miss Alma Rudolph will act as accompanist.

Will Run Another Week

"The Girl Question" is proving the biggest kind of a hit at the Van Ness Theatre, where it will run through the coming week. It is the first of the big eastern music play successes to come West this season. Great applause has greeted the efforts of the splendid cast of principals and sprightly chorus during the past week. Paul Nicholson in the role of "Con" Ryan has made a personal success. He is a clever comedian whose unctuous work goes immensely well with the big audiences. Henrietta Tedro, in the leading feminine role, is a pleasing figure in the cast and the same can be said of nearly all the principals. There are many novel features in the way of specialties and chorus work. The Eddie Foy imitation number is unquestionably one of the biggest hits seen here in a long time.

Orpheum Vaudeville

The program at the Orpheum for the week beginning this Sunday afternoon needs no eulogy. It speaks eloquently for itself. Jesse L. Lasky's latest triumph, "The Pianophiends," will be the headliner. The scenic settings for it are most elaborate and represent a large piano salesroom in which five men are seated playing ragtime at five pianos, when they are joined by four handsome and stylish girls, who assist them in their harmony. An octette is given which rivals in originality and melody the celebrated Florodora Sextette. The effect of nine pairs of hands playing on five pianos is described as particularly pleasing. All the artists are excellent pianists and vocalists. The Seven Yuilians, who are entirely new to this city, are celebrated the world over as acrobats and athletes. Their offering includes ground and lofty tumbling of a novel and daring kind. Claud and Fannie Usher will appear in the slang classic, "Fagan's Decision," which the eastern press deemed worthy of serious consideration. Fagan is a defeated pugilist who was prudent enough to save his money so when he meets his Waterloo he is financially speaking on Easy Street. He makes an effort to penetrate into swell society without success. In his loneliness he is about to adopt a twelve-year-old waif when he discovers that she is the daughter of the man who retired him from the ring by a foul over the heart. The little play is so thoroughly human in its rough pathos that when the Ushers reach the end of it, says an eastern critic, there are hundreds of wet eyes and fluttering handkerchiefs in the audience. The Reiff Brothers, the American dancing boys, will introduce one of the most original singing and dancing numbers in vaudeville. It will be the last week of Gardner and Vincent, A. O. Duncan, the two Pucks and of Charmion in her dainty transformation act. A series of new and realistic motion pictures, showing the famous Marathon race at the recent Olympic games, London, will teminate the performance.

Close of the Persse-Mason Opera Season

The Persse-Mason Opera Company, which has filled such a successful engagement at the American Theatre, will present during the final week of its stay at this playhouse the comic-opera success "Fra Diavolo." This amusing romantic opera has not been sung here for quite a number of years, and as it is one of the most popular of the standard light operas, it is a certainty that the engagement of this well balanced singing organization will wind up in a blaze of glory. Edith Mason, who sang the role of Zerlina when "Fra Diavolo" was sung at the old Grand Opera House, will again be heard in the delightful numbers which this part calls for. Miss Mason is in particularly good voice after her slight indisposition of ten days ago, and her rich, soprano voice never was so clear and distinct as it was in "Maritana." Thomas Persse will sing the role of Fra Diavolo, the brigand chief, while the balance of the cast will include Charles Swickard as Lord Allcash; Bernice Holmes as Lady Allcash; Mabel Goger as Francisco; Robert Lott as Beppo; Olga Osborne as Roberto and Joseph Fogarty as Giacomo. The production will be staged in a lavish manner and a most sumptuous revival of this opera is promised. The orchestra will be presided over by Paul Steindorff, whose directorship has been one of the pleasant features of the musical season at the American. "Fra Diavolo" will be sung for the first time on Sunday afternoon, September 20th.

Big Hits Promised at the American

The regular fall and winter season at the American Theatre will be ushered in Sunday afternoon, September 27th ,when the New York musical comedy success "Hip-Hip-Hooray" will be presented by the Rice & Cady company on a magnificent scale. The critics throughout the middle west speak in the highest terms of this production and the work of the German dialecticians, who became so popular during their long stay in this city. Following "Hip-Hip-Hooray" some of the biggest Broadway hits will be staged at the American Theatre by the original companies, and by a special arrangement with the booking agencies Manager Abe Cohn has succeeded in securing these star attractions at popular prices. All of the two dollar and dollar and a half shows are to be produced at the standard scale of prices established by the management of the Market street playhouse, ranging in

The Lloyd Scott "Travel Talks"

Manager Will Greenbaum announces as his opening attraction a series of illustrated "Travel-Talks" by the famous traveller, Mr. Lloyd Scott, A. B. (University of Pennsylvania) and of Jurisprudence (University of Heidelberg). Mr. Scott is an American by birth and has devoted many years to foreign travel and the art of photography. He is a fluent speaker and full of quaint humor so that his talks are not stereotyped lectures, but pleasant chats about his journeys, illustrated with beautifully colored lantern views, moving panoramas and motion pictures. Two courses of five subjects will be given at Christian Science Hall, commencing Monday night, October 5. The courses have been so arranged that one can attend the five talks without going on successive nights. For instance, those who purchase tickets for Course A will go Monday, Thursday and Saturday nights for the first week and Tuesday and Friday nights of the second. Holders of Course B tickets will go Tuesday and Friday nights of the first week and Monday, Thursday and Saturday nights of the second. The subjects will be "India," "Japan," Russia," "Egypt" and "Ireland." Course tickets will be on sale Monday, September 28, at Sherman Clay & Co's Van Ness avenue store. The price for a course of five will be $4.00, $3.00 and $2.00, according to location of seats. Arrangements are being made for two special matinees on Saturdays for school children. A complete course of these "Travel-Talks" will be given at Maple Hall, Oakland, commencing Monday night, October 17. This hall has been remodelled and is now one of the prettiest halls in the West. Manager Greenbaum expects to place a number of attractions there during the coming season. His big musical stars will as usual appear at Ye Liberty playhouse.

"The Conquerors" Next at the Valencia.

"The Conquerors" will be the second offering of the new stock company at the Valencia Theatre, beginning next Monday night, September 21st. This is the famous play by Paul Potter in which William Faversham and Viola Allen first won success at the Empire Theatre in New York. It is a romantic love story set amid the scenes of the Franco-Prussian war, in which a German officer occupying the ancient home of a beautiful French girl, first insults her and then wins her as his future wife. At the end of the first act the young lady throws a glass of wine into the face of her country's enemy, but in the end she falls into his arms. The love interest is strong, and the stage settings will be picturesque. The new Valencia stock company, which has made such a splendid impression in "The Great Ruby" this week, will be seen to exceptional advantage in "The Conquerors." Robert Warwick will have the dashing role of the young German officer who believes that to the conquerors in war belong the spoils of love, while Miss Willette Kershaw has a role that will show her art to excellent advantage. The rest of the company will be capitally cast.

In the Limelight

The musical season will open Thursday, October 22, with a joint concert by Anna Miller Wood of Boston, and Beatrice Priest Fine of New York. An exceptionally beautiful and interesting program is promised. Mr. Fred Maureer, Jr., will act as accompanist.

Manager Greenbaum has received the programs for the concerts by Signor Emilio De Gogorza, the handsome Spanish baritone. It includes songs in French, German, Italian, English and Spanish.

New engagements made by Will Greenbaum include Mme. Nordica, with a select concert company, Signor Constantine, the wonderful tenor and company and the "Royal Welsh Choir" from Cardiff.

Arthur Hartmann, the great Bohemian violin virtuoso, will be assisted on his present tour by Alfred Calzin, a young American piano virtuoso, who has recently met with great success abroad. Mr. Hartmann has never appeared in this city and his coming is expectantly waited for by hundreds of violin students.

Auto Notes

In the new Chalmers-Detroit car the four cylinders are cast together as in the latest Fiat, More, Argyll and Hotchkiss. This gives lightness, compactness, perfect alignment, and a dozen other advantages. The only argument ever advanced against it is "cost of replacement." This is answered by furnishing a set of four cylinders at $35, less than most dealers charge for two or even for one cylinder.

Stanley Ketchel is relieving the monotony of his training by excursions in his new White steamer through the country about Los Angeles. Ketchel proved an apt pupil in learning to operate the big White, and he promises to become an adept driver. "A day off occasionally does me a world of good when I am in training," said the rugged young battler. "Where some fighters would look upon an automobile ride as an uncalled for dissipation, I look upon it as just the reverse. After I have whirled and zig-zagged across the country for a couple of hours I find myself completely rested, as it takes my mind away from the training camp for the time being."

Mr. and Mrs. Winfield S. Davis and party made a trial trip in their new '09 Packard "30," driving to Napa, Petaluma, Healdsburg, St. Helena and return, a distance of 165 miles.

During the army maneuvers next month at Atascadero the officials of the War Department will include among the different events a test of motor cars for army use. Col. Brainard and the officers forming the courtmartial in the Captain Avery case, at the Presidio, will be among the local officials to test the cars. The officials in giving the big six-cylinder Thomas a preliminary examination yesterday at the Presidio, were enthusiastic over the possibilities of a powerful car, like the Thomas, in the rough work required for the army.

A wonderful demonstration of the change which the automobile has wrought in highway travel was made last week, over the old Forbes military road across the Allegheny mountains, when S. D. Waldon drove a Packard "30" car from Pittsburg to Philadelphia in 15 hours 58 minutes. Incidentally, this run broke the previous record by nearly two hours. A century ago when this road was the trunk line for all kinds of travel, it took the military wagons from fifteen to twenty days to make the same trip. The distance is 304 miles.

An important piece of news to the automobile trade is the announcement by E. P. Brinegar of the Pioneer Automobile Company to the effect that he will establish an agency in Fresno. A. C. Wheelock, formerly the Oakland representative of the Chalmers-Detroit and Thomas cars, and one of the best known automobile men in the state, will have charge of the new branch. A shipment of Chalmers-Detroit cars are now on the road to Fresno.

Probably one of the longest trips ever made out of San Francisco was made by Mr. J. H. Newbauer in his Packard "30" with Harry Jackson driving. Lieutenant Helms and S. Brizzolara were his guests. The party left here for San Bernardino and Los Angeles, visiting all the summer beaches about Los Angeles. thence to San Diego and Tia Juana in Old Mexico. Coming back they visited San Bernardino, Bakersfield, Visalia and Fresno. From Sacramento they went to Lake Tahoe and from Lake Tahoe back to Merced, from there to the Yosemite Valley and back to San Francisco. The whole distance covered on the trip was 5120 miles.

J. L. Robinson of Eureka has just closed a deal with the Pioneer Automobile Company for the agency of the Chalmers-Detroit and Thomas cars in that place. Owing to the early demand for this line of machines, Robinson ordered a shipment of Chalmers-Detroit cars for immediate delivery. Twenty cars will be in the first shipment.

Mrs. J. M. Etienne, who has been touring Southern California in her White steamer, expects to return to her home here this week. Accompanied by a party of friends, Mrs. Etienne made excursions in all directions from Pizmo Beach, where she made her headquarters.

Mr. and Mrs. Cuyler Lee motored to Del Monte last week in their big Packard to remain several days.

Dr. and Mrs. J. A. Black are on the road to Santa Cruz in their new Packard for a week's visit.

A strenuous tour of over 500 miles has just been completed by Dr. H. Davis of Oakland, the transbay motorist, accompanied by his family. They made the run from Oakland to Reno and return, crossing the Sierra Nevada mountains in their Thomas Forty touring car. In going up the famous Kingsbury grade the motorist was called upon to assist the stage coach the load being too heavy for the horses. No trouble was encountered on the trip, the Diamond tires on the car not even being punctured.

The new Chalmers-Detroit demonstrating car was turned over to A. C. Wheelock, manager of the Oakland branch of the Pioneer Automobile Company Monday for demonstrations. The car created the usual excitement in Oakland and a number of orders were taken. Telegrams were received this week from the Chalmers-Detroit Motor Company stating that two carloads, containing three machines each, were about to leave the factory. It is now expected that three carloads will be shipped weekly. The Pioneer Automobile Company expect to be caught up on their orders by the 15th of the month and after that time hope to be able to give almost immediate delivery on these cars.

would like to say. But I refrain. I do not wish to disturb the equanimity of Mr. Norie more than is necessary to express in this manner my regret that we have no writers to the manner born who are competent to teach Mr. Norie that he is an interloper in a field where none but native sons should reap. When a writing man must be imported from Scotland to tell the stories of California it is time for writing men and women of California to hide their diminished heads. It is useless to plead that we have writers (thinking of Gelett Burgess, Wallace Irwin and Joaquin Miller) who can write the legends of California better than they can be written by W. Drummond Norie. These writers have not written the stories, and that is sufficient answer to those who would find fault with Mr. Norie for trying to write them. I hope that Mr. Norie will keep right on practicing his art "in our midst" until he shames some of us into doing better what he is doing as well as he can.

teul's wine. Not knowing the trick the poet inadvertently drank and died within a few hours. Goldsmith and the poet Edmund Smith fell victims to their stubbornness in prescribing for themselves in opposition to their medical advisers. The poet Cowley, going home from a carousal one night, lay down to rest beside a hedge. The night dews gave him a chill to which he soon succumbed. The poet Fletcher fell a victim to personal vanity. He had ordered a new suit of clothes, and refused, though the plague was raging, to leave London before they were sent home. He stayed in town, caught the plague and died. His friend Massinger, who afterwards shared his grave, like Duke and Savage, was found dead in bed. Correggio threw himself into a pleurisy which ended him, by dragging a heavy load of copper for eight miles under a burning sun. Ubaldus Baldus, one of the profoundest lawyers that ever lived, was playing with his little dog one day. The animal nipped him on the lip. No notice was taken of the cut at the time but in a few months the master was dead.

Lord Bacon fell a martyr to his scientific curiosity. One day he was driving through the snow and it suddenly occurred to him that snow must from its chemical ingredients have a preservative property, and he resolved to put his theory to the proof. Stopping his carriage at a neighboring farm house, he purchased a chicken and stuffed it with snow. He took a chill. His condition quickly became so alarming that he was carried into a nearby mansion. There a damp bed aggravated his symptoms and he died in a few days.

With such instances as these going on about them the wise men of all nations have fashioned their lives so that "when the sacred vessel is signalled from Delos" the messenger may find them as he found Socrates, Berkeley and those stout hearts who have found a confident and a calm spirit in right living. As Bryant expressed it:

"So live, that when thy summons comes to join
The innumerable caravan, which moves
To that mysterious realm, where each shall take
His chamber in the silent halls of death,
Thou go not, like the quarry slave at night,
Scourged to his dungeon, but, sustained and soothed
By an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave
Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams."

Mascagni on German Music

Pietro Mascagni is the latest musician to express his dislike of "Salome." He believes that the work will have no continuing success, as the score is not clear and is bizarre, and he finds that the best things in the music are taken from Rossini. He declares that all German music has been in a decadent state since the death of Wagner, and thinks that Italians can alone bring life into the present moribund field of operatic production, since Italian of all languages is alone musical.

A Picture of Medieval Italy

In her third novel, Marjorie Bowen has gone back to medieval Italy, to that troubled period when the House of Anjou, the Pope and the Neapolitan nobles were alike interested in the succession of the crown, and to those glorious days when a few murders more or less, a career of treachery and deceit, and a lifetime of scheming made no particular difference in the esteem bestowed on the successful. The old king lay dying, and in order to right an ancient wrong and save his own soul, he had betrothed his two granddaughters to the two princes of Hungary, thus securing the succession in the old line in any event, as he supposed. But Giovanna, married by proxy to Konrad, had no mind to rule in conjunction with any one, and neither did she mean to strengthen her husband's hands by permitting the alliance of her gentle sister Maria with Andreas. She was a most capable and clever lady, and the manner in which she planned her course, the unmitigated cruelty with which she treated the unfortunate Konrad, the cold-blooded indifference with which she disposed of her accomplices when it was inconvenient to risk possible disclosures, as well as the audacity with which she blindfolded Andreas, come to avenge the death of his brother, prove that a prince consort would have been of little value in her reign. Whether Marjorie Bowen is writing accurate history or not is little to the purpose. What she has done, and that is much, is to give a living picture of another day, and make it so interesting as to inspire the reader with an inclination to delve into history and read up for himself the events of the fourteenth century. The best that can be asked or expected of a historical novel is that it will present a fairly accurate background on which to display the meager accounts of related in school histories, which for the most part, do not progress beyond the names of rulers and the dates of their deaths. It is not worth while to quarrel with possible discrepancies for "The Sword Decides" is infinitely more interesting reading, whether it be all fact or all fiction, or a judicious blending of the two, than any of the recent "Zenda" type of romance. Published by the McClure Company.

A Typical New England Village

The name Richard Brinsley Newman is used to conceal the identity of an author who is believed to be a popular Eastern clergyman. Under the guise of a precocious lad of fifteen, the son of a peripatetic minister, Richard relates the family experiences in a typical New England village, where the people were devout church attendants who took every small advantage they could both of the minister and of each other. They made no practical application of the sermons to themselves, and when they found their preacher expecting them to take the words home they speedily let him know that they could dispense with his services. The Rev. Newman was a godly man, too unworldly to protect his own interests, and matters went from bad to worse with him and his. Like so many of the old New Englanders, he almost made a fetich of learning, and like the typical preacher's son, Richard had small regard for what had no immediate practical value. There are some remarkably well-drawn pictures of a village school, the church activities, old fashioned temperance rallies and other such occurrences, and some very unflattering portraits of various worthies who are to be found in similar localities. Despite young Richard's squabbles with his sister, "Tyee Wowo," whose fanciful mother had christened the child Irene Aurora, and whose infant efforts to pronounce her name gave her brother such an irresistible chance to tease her forever more, he was far from being a bad boy, and like many another whose youthful back is turned full on the church, he ended by himself mounting the pulpit stairs. The story is well written. Time was when a fifteen year old boy of good family might have done it, at least as far as the correct English is concerned, but that is long, long ago, before the "educator" superseded the school master. Whether a boy of fifteen would have been capable of making the same shrewd comments and observations is another matter, but that need not spoil the enjoyment of the reader who, whether he has sojourned in the wilds and wildernesses and calls up his remembrances, or whether he is city-bred and is encountering novelties, will find much to interest and amuse him as well as to ponder on. Lothrop, Lee and Shepard are its publishers.

SUMMONS

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA, IN AND FOR THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO.

No. 15,983.

NANCY THERESA BERGEMAN-HAVERLY,
Plaintiff,
vs.
PAUL J. BERGEMAN-HAVERLY,
Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA send greeting to PAUL J. BERGEMAN-HAVERLY, Defendant.

YOU ARE HEREBY REQUIRED to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, on the ground of defendant's extreme cruelty towards plaintiff, also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

GIVEN under my hand and the Seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 14th day of April, A. D. 1908.

SUMMONS

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA, IN AND FOR THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO.

No. 10,530.

CATHERINE STAPLETON,
Plaintiff,
vs.
ALL PERSONS CLAIMING ANY INTEREST IN OR LIEN UPON, THE REAL PROPERTY HEREIN DESCRIBED, OR ANY PART THEREOF.
Defendants.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA to all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described, or any part thereof, Defendants, Greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Catherine Stapleton, plaintiff, filed with the Clerk of the above-entitled Court and County, within three (3) months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property, or any part thereof, situate, lying and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and particularly described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the westerly line of Franklin street, at its intersection with the northerly line of Ivy avenue, and running thence northerly along said westerly line of Franklin street twenty-five (25) feet, thence at right angles westerly and parallel with the north line of Ivy avenue one hundred and seven (107) feet six (6) inches, thence at right angles southerly twenty-five (25) feet to the northerly line of Ivy avenue, thence at right angles easterly and along said northerly line of Ivy avenue one hundred and seven (107) feet six (6) inches to the westerly line of Franklin street, and the point of commencement, being a portion of Western Addition, Block No. 139.

And you are hereby notified that unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit:

That it be adjudged that the plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple absolute; that her title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiff recover her costs herein and have such other and further relief as may be meet in the premises.

WITNESS my hand and the seal of said Court, this 31st day of August, A. D. 1908.

TOWN TALK

THE PACIFIC WEEKLY

THE TALK OF THE TOWN

is the return of "Sunny Jim" and his best of all breakfast foods—the original flaked wheat food that you always liked

"FORCE"

It was always good enough, but now it is better than ever. Made of the choicest wheat that grows, steam-cooked, malted, rolled in thin flakes and baked until it is crisp and delicious.

It pays to Talk when you have something to say. Get the Talking habit by eating a food that is full of Talk. Eat "FORCE" every day in the week no matter what you eat on other days—and you will be at the top-notch of mental vigor and physical power. It is the predigested energy of the whole wheat combined with barley malt.

Always crisp it before serving it by pouring it into a pan or earthenware dish and warming it in oven; then serve in large dish with cream, piling the flakes on one side of the dish and pouring the milk in on the other side, dipping the flakes as eaten.

The Wages of Human Ignorance

A man was killed the other day while experimenting with an airship. Many men will be killed in airships. Those who go down to the sea in ships may fear to be drowned; and those who go up in the air may expect to be dashed to the ground. Those who ride to and fro athwart the land may reckon their chances of life and death; and those who sail in aeroplanes or dirigibles must take similar chances of coming out of their adventure unscathed, sound in wind and limb. When man, puny man, vested with a little brief control of the elements, most ignorant of what he's most assured, lays hold of the giant forces of nature, he must know that sooner or later he will come to grief; nay, that as long as he struggles in this unequal combat with the primal laws of the universe he must continually submit to defeat, disaster, death. Icarus invented a flying machine that outflew the flight of the eagles; but when the sun melted the wax of his wings he was dashed to death in the sea; when Orville Wright's propeller broke under the strain of its vertiginous velocity, he was instantly in the grip of a natural law that compelled obedience inevitably, mercilessly, without hope of appeal. The laws of nature are multitudinous, mysterious, complex. The energy of nature is irresistible. The genius of man can only discover these laws and apply them the one against the other to achieve an equilibrium oftentimes merely factitious, frequently deceptive, always dangerous. The energy of nature can be guided, it is never controlled. Man thinks he has harnessed steam and chained the thunderbolt; but only the other day the tubes of the Bennington blew out and the giant was loose again, breathing death in the faces of all who stood in opposition; and every day some man dies in the coil of a live wire. If Orville Wright could have tested every part of his flying machine before he began his flight he would have made safe concession to the laws of nature, for Orville Wright knows those laws within the jurisdiction of what we call aerostatics as a competent judge knows the statutes within the compass of his jurisdiction; if the builders of the Bennington could have watched the processes of molecular disintegration there would have been no explosion on the ship; if those who dally with live wires would always take the precaution to wear rubber gloves they would live to die of typhoid fever or old age. These things are obvious. The schoolboy knows them. The learned specialist can only formulate the law; he cannot control the forces that are governed by the law. And the slightest violation of the law releases the forces—and man, puny man, vested with a little brief control of the elements, most ignorant of what he's most assured, suffers, struggles an instant, and perishes. We call it "accident"; the ancient Greeks called it "destiny"; the Oriental says it is fate; the wise man of the West knows that it is ignorance.

Hearst the Magician

If to be rescued from any of the humdrums of a life of pain and pangs is a blessing then the Hon. William R. Hearst is one of the benefactors of his species. The present political campaign could not have escaped the censure of downright insipidity if Mr. Hearst, pregnant with detraction, had not happened on the shockingly tame scene and lifted us out of boredom with the power of his chin. With a few wags of his rude and intractable tongue this magician of the bema commanded and compelled our attention, and then to rouse us from our lethargy he injected into us a stimulant that is homeopathic in its simplicity. Dr. Hearst is a skilled pathologist and he knows the susceptibilities of his American patients. Sensible of our capacity for assimilating disparagement he dosed us with our favorite nostrum and we absorbed it with delight. Immediately the calm was routed, the desultory depression passed off and we realized that we were in a most gratifying state of excitement. We now feel that the tone of the campaign has reached the level prescribed by the traditions of American politics. Proud names have been dragged from their heights, and lofty heads are bowed in shame. Now is the goddess of slander and misrepresentation going about with a mirror in her hand, dazzling the crowd, revealing her triple-crowned proteges with the ensign of liberty and a cornucopia in their grasp; discovering the objects of her hostility in ugly shapes; dipping her wings in mud and scattering it in the eyes of the multitude. Is there anything more to be desired?

His Divine Purpose

Mr. Hearst marches over the carcases of his slaughtered foes with keen delight. With all the enthusiasm of a divinely commissioned scourge, with something of the vindictiveness of a Joshua, he is blazing a path of vengeance from Goshen even unto Gibeon. Like Bentley of whom Swift tells us that he was dissatisfied with everybody's conduct but his own, Mr. Hearst sees the trail of the serpent everywhere save in his own camp, and views with suspicion every act of his opponents that even remotely accords with preconceived notions of corruption. Mr. Hearst is presumed to be doing effective politics, but the logic of his philosophy is not apparent. Proof of corruption in the Republican and Democratic parties does not vindicate the purity of the men whom Mr. Hearst commends to our confidence. On the contrary, so far as Senator Foraker is concerned, by establishing a connection between that statesmen and the octopus, Mr. Hearst performs a valuable service for the head and front of the Republican administration. Foraker has been President Roosevelt's most bitter foe in the Senate, and to no one, perhaps, is that statesman's humiliation more gratifying than to the Chief Magistrate of the country. But if Senator Foraker is all that Mr. Hearst's imputations indicate then the country too has been rendered a valuable service by the distinguished prophet of the Independence League. But we are not sure that Mr. Hearst has made out a case against the Ohio statesman. As a politician Senator Foraker has been indiscreet, but it is not certain that he is corrupt. It has been shown that he is on very intimate terms with Standard Oil officials, but in this he has never dissembled. Nobody has ever confounded Foraker with La Follette. The Wisconsin Senator, as everybody knows, is devoted to the interests of organized labor and hostile to the powerful industrial corporations; and nobody thinks it wrong for him to have relations with Samuel Gompers or to strengthen his popularity by advocating legislation designed to gratify the socialistic sentiments of the mob. Senator La Foleltte is the darling of the proletariat, and Senator Foraker is the champion of the interests which are menaced by the demagogues. As such champion

Senator Foraker must very often receive communications from the men whose interests he protects. Must we conclude that he has been bribed by these men? This conclusion in our judgment is not imperative. Must we conclude that Senator Foraker is guilty of treachery to the people because he protects the industrial interests from the machinations of the demagogues? Would it not be most unjust to do so. History teaches us that the wise and honest and most patriotic statesmen in all ages have been those that resisted the encroachments of the majority and insisted that the principles of sound government accord to the minority rights Demos is bound to respect. The demagogues tell us that the trouble in this country is that the people do not rule; that the minority exercise a predominant influence in the government; and Mr. Hearst would have us believe that statesmen of the Foraker type are responsible for the inequality which exists. Perhaps Mr. Hearst is right. Perhaps the equilibrium which the Founders contrived no longer exists. Perhaps in protecting the minority Senator Foraker has been unfaithful to his trust. But let us hope that he is not quite so degraded as Mr. Hearst would have us believe. At the same time let us hope that Mr. Hearst really believes that he is leading us from the Slough of Despair to the Delectable Mountain. Having a catholicon for our political ills, doubtless he feels that before he can administer it he must get us into a receptive mood by exploiting the explosive possibilities of our nature. All rival political prophets, whether galled or not, must be made to wince before Mr. Hearst will find it expedient to pull the cork and let peace and plenty flow over a grateful land.

Only a Man's Reason

Woman—shall we call her "lovely woman?"—is once more in arms and eager for the fray. Perhaps it would have been more accurate if we had used the specific instead of the generic plural in this discussion—not woman, but women; for in truth woman is not demanding the ballot but women are insisting on the right to vote. It is a delicate subject. We are not at liberty to deal with it as we deal with other political themes; and therein the opponent of woman suffrage is at a disadvantage. He cannot strike a woman as he would strike a man; he cannot treat her political theories and her absurd conditions as he would treat those of his own sex. He must trump her clubs with hearts; he must respond to her stony stare by giving up his seat in the street car; he must breathe the softest of answers to turn away her wrath; he must give her the only "right" that belongs exclusively to him, while allowing her to retain all that she now possesses by constant acquisition since Eve commanded the man to eat, and he, poor fool—did eat. However, at the risk of giving mortal offense to those whom we most dearly love; to those whom we admire; and to those whom we have married or hope to marry, we are resolved to pursue our course in this matter even to the end, bitter though it be. We state it frankly and candidly—we do not think it would be well for woman, women, or the commonwealth if we should accede to the demand of the suffragists. That's as gently as we can break the sad news to Mary. In the first place we do not think woman wants the ballot which the women are demanding; in the second place we do not believe the women would know what to do with the ballot after we had given it to them; in the third place we are convinced that the women would waste the ballot on candidates whom they liked instead of bestowing it on candidates whom they were sure were worthy, capable and honest; in the fourth place we are of the opinion that a woman vote would merely double the trouble that the man vote is causing at every election; in the fifth—but why continue? Reasons opposing the suffrage of women are as plentiful as blackberries. Levity, you say—we are treating a solemn subject with levity. Well, listen: A male citizen of Colorado, where the women vote as often as the law allows, has been in town and he has told us that woman suffrage is a rank failure in Colorado; that the women vote as they are told to vote; either by their husbands, fathers, brothers or employers; that notwithstanding the secrecy of the Australian ballot the women who vote it are afraid they will be found out if the vote is contrary to the wishes of some man whom it is their duty to serve; that they are as susceptible to sentiment and the impulse of the moment as they were when they couldn't vote—as uncertain, coy and hard to please as they were when man was a suitor for their hands and not a candidate for their votes; that they haven't changed their natures an iota nor bettered the political conditions of the State in the slightest degree; and finally, that the women voters of Colorado although granted the voting privilege by the Democrats insist upon voting the Republican ticket, generally as straight as a row of buttons on a back-fastening shirt waist. No "levity" in that resume, is there? Certainly, by this account the situation in the woman-suffrage State of Colorado seems serious enough. Of course it would would be quite different in California. The women who want to vote in California are a more discriminating aggregation than those of Colorado; they are neither sentimental nor susceptible; they are not timid nor man-ruled; they know their politics and they would vote against the "nicest" candidate on the ticket of their party if he thought he would betray the trust they are tempted to bestow upon him; and above all they are grateful for the favor which the Democratic convention gave them in pledging its candidates to support the woman suffrage amendment in the next legislature—if these women ever vote they will vote the Democratic ticket first, last and all the time. It can be urged that even if all we have said against the proposition to give the ballot to women is true, much of it can be urged also against a considerable mass of men voters. Whereupon we answer that two bad conditions do not make a good one. It may be argued that the addition of women voters to the voting population would not make matters worse than they are and perhaps it would make them better.

To which it may be answered that if women voters would not make matters worse than they are what good will be accomplished by the additional vote? and the supplementary possibility that the women will better the political conditions is too remote to have bearing on the question. We don't like to say positively that the women shall not vote; but we do say, with such emphasis as our gallantry will permit, that wo do not think it is advisable to let the women vote. Moreover, we do not believe the majority of women would vote if they could, unless all the polls were clustered in the shopping district.

Our Honest Supervisors

As if to awaken men's minds to the incommensurate magnitude of the point at issue the Examiner has spoken plainly, broadly and shockingly of the Supervisors for voting for the sale of city bonds to certain brokers who apparently were vouchsafed a winning advantage over competitors. The Examiner is evidently of the opinion that the majority of the Board of Supervisors are waist deep in transactions of the most scandalous character; that instead of being model public servants, these men who have been branded as of the elect, are as unworthy of confidence as their predecessors. After an elaborate review of their delinquencies the Examiner accuses them of a canine subserviency to the wicked and incorrigible public service corporations. In all that this accusation implies we cannot concur. Though we hold no brief for the Supervisors a sense of fairness and a love of accuracy impels us to deny an imputation which we believe to be unwarranted. While it is not for us to measure relative merit or award the palm of virtue; and conscious though we are that under the current dispensation the quality of municipal government is not superior to what it was when Gallagher and his associates were prostituting their conscience for hire, yet we will reseut in behalf of the Supervisors the odious imputation that they are the tools of the corporations. We are convinced that the motive which now inspires our servants in office is somewhat different from that which animated Ruef's licentious and thrifty henchmen. The men who voted for the sale of the city's bonds to Rollins & Sons are not, we are quite sure, of the same sordid character as their predecessors The passion that now inspires much of the zeal in the Board of Supervisors is the lust of office. The men consumed with this passion are good men cast upon times that require great men, and with the cunning of the ostrich and the sagacity of the goose they are striving to promote their own interests by methods that savor of the species of imbecility which distinguishes the yokel who brought a bunghole to a cooper to have a barrel built on it. These men are not to be bribed by a corporation with cold cash. The thought of figuring at the reeciving end of so iniquitous and shameful a transaction would prostrate any one of the civic patriots of this Administration with mental agony. These men abound in conscientious scruples against selling themselves for cash, but in their code of morality there is nothing enjoining them from cinching a corporation in expectation of the bribe of public favor. Nor is it inconsistent with their morality to further the interests of men and newspapers whose friendship they conceive to be essential to their political welfare.

The Evil of Mutual Forbearance.

The transaction by which Rollins & Son obtained the city's bonds was characterized by Mayor Taylor as an "ethical wrong." This is distinctly a poetical conception of the matter. If Mayor Taylor had been trying to describe his own conduct in riding in an automobile at the expense of the taxpayers he could not have been any more charitable. But of course Mayor Taylor cannot be expected to reproach the Supervisors with severity. Mayor Taylor and the Supervisors are blood relations in politics, all having been hatched in one nest and warmed into life under one wing. Moreover Mayor Taylor is under deep obligations to the Spreckels-Phelan flock of patriots. His passion for an automobile they are amiaboly indulging and doing so they are guilty for his sake of something worse than an "ethical wrong"; they are conniving at an unprecedented extravagance which amounts to a crime against the taxpayers of the city, and, what is worse they are almost incapacitating our darling Mayor from the conscientious performance of his duties, since his own conduct which they encourage renders it inadvisable for him to be intolerant of those who follow his example. Hence the District Attorney with an automobile. And thus we see the mischief born of mutual forbearance and reciprocal blinking at official delinquencies. And the more we study the prevailing system, honeycombed as it is with reciprocal benefits which are eloquent of ethical wrongs, the less surprised are we at Mayor Taylor's failure to discern in the bond transaction anything more reprehensible than the violation of an ethical principle.

Our Futile School System

It is a singular anomaly that with the constantly increasing facilities for obtaining an education our school system is becoming more and more inefficient. Hardly a day passes without authoritative testimony being offered of the futility of the system. According to Colonel Larned, in the September North American Review, the examinations at West Point of candidates for admission prove that the schools of the country are turning out an inferior quality of material. The average degree of ignorance exhibited at these examinations would disgrace a Hottentot. The candidates fall below the average not in any special branch, but uniformly in all. A high school teacher discussing educational matters in the Independent, says she has been unable to conjecture how children manage to attend school so long and learn so little. President Benjamin Ide Wheeler adds his voice to the doleful chorus by lamenting that the two additional years recently added to the length of the school course are given over to excelsior and sawdust padding instead of to solid work. President Wheeler might have gone further and justly attributed the failure of our school system to the fact that it has absorbed too many non-essentials. But perhaps President Wheeler prefers not to go into the matter; for he is probably not unaware of the fact that for some of the defects of our school system our university educators are responsible. The present courses of study in the primary and secondary schools are their handiwork. These schools have been designed to fit the pupils for training in a university, and the fact has been lost sight of that many grammar school pupils are destined to begin the struggle for existence long before they will have reached the age at which the average youth begins his career as a college athlete. ..

The Turn of the Night

By Edith M. Thomas.

In the rapt moonlight, far within the heart
  Of Summer night, when all souls dreamed or slept
  Amid the stillest stillness, Something crept,
Of shadow-pain, that from the Past did start,
Or seemed to start; as, leaning there, apart,
  I thought of that old tale of one who kept
  Her jealous watch; whose sudden anger leapt,
And slew her love, with shadow-cleaving dart!

I heard the whisper, "Come, thou gentle breeze,
  O veni, aura!" broken by a moan,
That through the sleeping world still widening passed:
A trouble came upon the grass, the trees;
  The soft-lipped flowers received it for their own,
So, onward borne, it woke the Dawn, at last.

Perspective Impressions

Detective Burns's rough work is getting almost too tough even foi indulgent judges.

Kicking a man when he's down evidently is not barred by the Marquis of Oyster Bay rules.

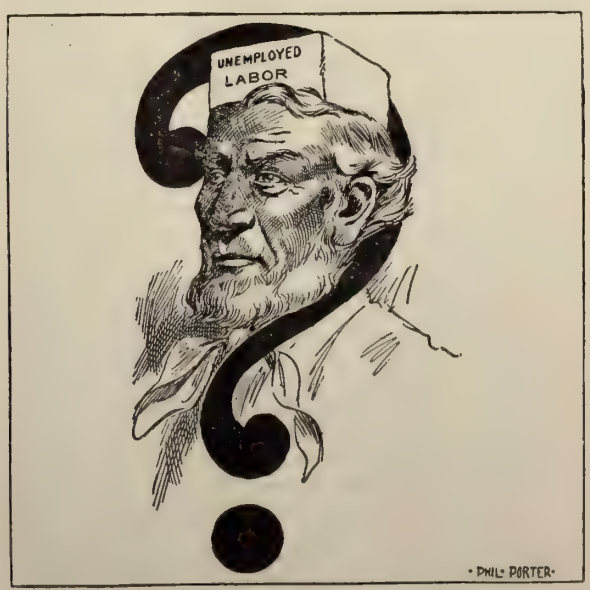
Does anybody really believe that it is possible to make Judge Dunne look like a martyr?

The least educated of men is he who is so ruled by his prejudices that he will not receive instructions from his enemies.

The more Bryan bloviates the more he persuades us that his principles are as unfixed as the drifting sands before the fearful simoons.

If Bryan is able to cause a panic in the stock market by stirring up a little enthusiasm on his tour, what would be his potentialities for mischief in the event of his election?

Something dropped in Judge Lawlor's court the other day, and that perennial source of amusement, the Hon. F. J. Heney, behaved like a short-tailed bull in fly time.



Apparently it doesn't matter much to the average taxpayer what our lovely Supervisors do. The average taxpayer probably feels like the old woman's eels which eventually got used to being skinned.

The spectacle of Teddy, the great sportsman, jumping on Senator Foraker just after the latter had been knocked down by Mr. Hearst reminds us of an incident of the Spanish war. But we can't recall just where it was the brave rough rider shot the fleeing soldier.

The New York Sun, the most ardent of all Governor Hughes' newspaper supporters, says that candor compels the statement that the Democratic nominee, Mr. Chanler, "is an adversary not to be despised"; also, "if there is any reason for distrusting him it is not conspicuous."

A Spy

By Charles Procope

In France, almost in the center of a valley that lies near the German frontier, rises a huge cotton mill. The valley is surrounded on all sides by green hills, many of them crowned with pines and birches. Inside of the factory three hundred women and girls attach the threads to the strident looms, in front of the whirling bobbins. A white cloud of cotton dust falls upon them, powdering their blonde and brown hair and their blue, green and pink waists and skirts. Laughing, chattering their voices often rise above the clatter of the machines. Their mothers and fathers are at work in the fields. The smaller children drive the cattle to the pastures and the mountainside. Their brothers cut wood in the forest. From April to November it was rare that there was any continuous rain; a steady breeze carrying the gray and black clouds far beyond the valley. So six months in the year these young girls labored in a country that was almost magical; the tones of the forest seemed to melt from green into a darker blue as the tops of the trees met the sky line; the green valley lay like an emerald in darker setting of hills and into this certainly the brave knight Lohengrin would some day come, drawn by his swan on the little river that bisected the valley. This the old teacher had seriously promised his scholars when he translated to them the poems of Wagner. He had also taught them that the era of deadly and barbarous wars was forever closed.

The last time, in 1870, the Germans and French had battled in these mountains of Vosges, each trying to triumph over the other, after the matter of the ancient tyrants. Since then both countries had admitted the folly of following instincts which they had inherited from their barbarous ancestors. Thanks be to God, the power of labor, infinitely multiplied and extended by the invention of machinery, had taught man this great and beautiful truth: "It is better to produce than to destroy." Now the laboring men of both nations having ceased to hate each other would force the kings into an eternal peace. The industrious workmen would unite and form around the world a chain of incorruptible fraternity. He taught his scholars songs of love, peace and friendship between nations, accompanying their voices on an old violin.

One evening when the little weavers were awaiting the coming of Lohengrin, picking daisies and dandelions in the valley or pursuing each other in games on the river banks, one of these songs was heard. The wind brought it from the east where lay Germany. In the cool and intoxicating evening, under a sky that was luminous with the reflected rays of the setting sun, the breeze charged with the odor of new mown hay, the song rising, swelling, echoing, rolled down the valley. On the slopes of the hills the fathers and mothers were unloading the carts, while the axes of the brothers could still be heard ringing in the forest. An answering song arose from the girls. As that from the east came nearer, male voices were recognized and a troop of men appeared at the hilltop, tall men with blonde beards, smoking long, curved pipes and dressed as workmen.

Anxious and alarmed, the young girls hid themselves while they watched these men pass. Then one of the weavers remembered that the manager of the factory had engaged a number of German mechanics to take charge of the new looms which had been imported from America, for all the mechanics in that part of the country were engaged at work in the city.

The apprentices amused themselves by joining in the refrain of the international song, and when the Germans reached the door of the wine house the song had been taken up by hundreds of voices. France, by the mouths of the girls and young women, welcomed the strangers, who were to partake of their hospitality and share their bread. On the steps of the schoolhouse the old teacher stood smiling, his violin in his hand.

The next day the young Germans installed themselves at the American machines and did their work intelligently and honestly. In the evening they smoked their long pipes with their painted porcelain bowls on the bank of the little river.

The warm spring season incited to love. Sunday they danced in the courtyard of the wine house, and the blonde boys waltzed with the pretty weavers; they knew how to speak so humbly, so sentimentally and even their silences were eloquent.

There was one couple which was envied by all. Hans was admired for his intelligence and his politeness; Violette for her charm and gaiety. He had hair the color of spun gold and eyes that were as blue as a mountain pool; she, under a mass of brown hair, showed a delicate face in which there were two large eyes, black as night. Once in a while when people caught them kissing each other they felt a thrill of admiration. The old teacher did not scold his little niece Violette very hard, when she came home late, her lips still humid with her lover's kisses.

"And when does the marriage take place?" asked the old man.

"At harvest time, uncle."

"So much the better. Be good until then."

"Hans is a good man, uncle."

"Put some ashes on the fire of your eyes. They flame too much, little one, for any man to be good, even a German, when he is with you."

"Oh, uncle, you're an old rascal."

About that time those who read the newspapers at the wine house of Louis told the others of the threatening difficulties which had arisen in regard to the question of Morocco. One day, the foreman, Dupont, who had won a military medal at Madagascar, read aloud in the court of the factory an article relating to a large number of horses which the Germans had purchased in Russia for their cavalry, and the veteran called out to Hans and asked him if he really thought France and Germany would come to blows after all. Hans laughed. "All those rumors," he said, "were started by sensational papers and stock brokers, people who wanted to bear stock and buy it up cheap, selling it at a higher price later when the absence of all danger was fully realized." He took the foreman over to the inn and treated him to a glass of foaming beer, and together they drank to the fraternity of nations.

Hans and Violette were too much in love to pay any attention to political affairs. During the evening, when these discussions ran high, they wandered off into the woods, persuaded that Bebel and Jaures, the apostles of Peace, would know how to prevent the capitalists from pushing the countries into a war. That night they wandered deep into the forest and it was late when Violette returned to her home.

The following Sunday Violette got up very early and dressed herself quickly. She wanted to surprise her lover at a place where she knew he often fished for trout, in his leisure moments. She crossed the fields and entered the wood. She begged the birds not to fly away in order that her presence might not be indicated by the noise of their wings. Soon she distinguished the form of Hans through the bushes. She stopped, her heart beating madly. She wondered he could not hear her. Com-

Reviving a Feudal System

Some Sarcastic Reflections on the Gentle Art of Disciplining and Otherwise Dealing with the Mediaeval Crime of Poaching, and Including Some Suggestions as to the Best Method of Punishing Poachers Without Resorting to the Extremity of Killing them Outright.

By Democritus.

I am decidedly averse from the death penalty as a punishment for poaching. In this frame of mind I do not object to the private ownership of vast preserves over which the owners may hunt for the game that happens to fly, crawl, creep, run, swim or cavort, in the air above or the waters under the preserve or in the dry land therein. Furthermore, I would not protest if the law raised the misdemeanor of trespassing to the felony of burglary. On my own preserve of half an acre and liberty I have erected signboards bearing the inhospitable legends, "Keep off the grass," "No trespassing aloud," "Don't build fires near the woodpile," "Beware the big dog," "Look out for man-traps and spring guns," and many other unique and menacing aphorisms, apothegms, maxim, axioms, admonitions, objurgations and anathemas. But my awful signs are merely a conspicuous and futile bluff—a hollow mockery and a false pretense. In truth my grass is a volunteer crop, trespassers laugh at my signs and shoot birdshot into them, my woodpile is under my house, my dog is an innocuous fox terrier who won't even extirpate the gophers in my strawberry patch, I have contrived no man-traps or boy-traps, and I would not know how to set a spring gun anyway.

I make this statement and confession to corroborate my previous inference that I am harmless to poachers while claiming a right to my own landed property, and to kill anything except human beings that I may find within the pale of my domain. Why should I seek the life of my fellowman (the small boy prowling under my apple tree and through my melon patch are my special bane) simply because he chases a rabbit into my potato patch or hunts the toothsome canvasback from a surreptitious blind beside my trout pond? Why should I kill the pot-hunter potting plover on my preserve? He has the life-instinct as highly developed as myself; he fears death as much as I do; he loves life as well as I; he has kindred who will mourn his loss as keenly as mine would if I should die intestate. No, let the pot-hunting poacher live. Warn him off the preserve if you will; threaten him with death if you think he will move out of your lot more rapidly; heave rocks at him if you think he will not fire his gun in your direction; but don't murder him in cold blood. Remember that you have every advantage over the prowling poacher. While he is hunting the game on your preserve you are hunting him from behind a tree, in the shrubbery or on the top of a tall tank overlooking the landscape. It is as cowardly to shoot an unsuspecting poacher in the back as it is to shoot your worst enemy after he is down and out.

Furthermore, the game which the poacher is hunting is not wholly yours. It is temporarily within your personal jurisdiction, to be sure, but tomorrow it may be on some other person's land. In strict equity the owner of a preserve has no more right to the game that traverses his preserve than has the poacher who captures it. Only the land is yours, and when you bought the land you did not also buy the wild game. Keep the poacher out of your preserve, drive him out if you can; but don't presume to kill him for killing that which doesn't belong to you. The notion that game is private property as soon as it comes upon private land is a relic of the barbarous ages when barons held sway and robber knights traversed the upland, the lowland and the flowery meads of Aquitaine and Picardy. Tradition tells us that posterity came near to losing its greatest poet in consequence of a legal privilege granted to landholders to treat poachers as they would treat housebreakers. If gentle Will Shakespeare had been caught in the act of stalking deer in the park of Sir Thomas Lucy it is probable that some bloodthirsty gamekeeper would have shot the budding bard of Avon in his tracks. Think of that catastrophe! Think of what we would have lost if some loutish servitor of the Lucy household had killed the author of Macbeth and Hamlet! Only Sir Thomas Lucy, if his shade is sensible of the consequences, can regret that Shakespeare was not slaughtered before he used the personality of the doddering old magistrate as the basis of his inimitably ridiculous character of Justice Shallow.

As I have said, I do not object to game preserves, however extensive. But I would make a distinction between the owner or owners of a game preserve and those who hunt for game outside of the preserve. If I were czar of California I would enact a law that only a limited game bag or creel of fish could be shot or hooked on a private preserve. I would hold that all the wild game in the empire was common property as long as it was on common ground, and in fixing the quantity that could be killed by any person I would prescribe that only one-tenth as much could be killed in a private preserve. I would say to the hunters: "You may kill this game in the open, but you have no right to convert the open into a private park for the sequestration of such game as may fly or sneak into it. I will not permit the outsider to invade your preserve, neither will I allow you to take advantage of the outsider by fencing your land and laying claim to everything that comes upon it. As soon as you come into possession of a so-called "age preserve" you shall have only that proportion of all the game in the empire which is in absolute ratio of yourself and the members of your 'gun-club' to all the inhabitants of my empire." That would fix the "game preserve" question. It would reduce the equity to its just dimensions. It would open the markets to the wild game of the State and everybody could eat the wild duck, the stricken deer, the toasted quail, the toothsome trout, and the jackrabbit, whenever he had the longing and the price. I am a socialist to that extent. I don't approve of one class of citizens dining on hot birds while the rest of us are compelled to be content with hot tamales.

The recent killing of a young man by the gamekeeper of a preserve on the Alviso marshes has aroused intense feeling throughout the state against the owners of preserves. The victim of the gamekeeper's malignity was only suspected of "poaching." It is said that he and his companions were only seeking a place in which to erect a "blind" on ground common to all hunters. The gamekeeper, however, apparently made no effort to ascertain whether the men were poaching on the preserves of his employers; and it is certain he made no effort to warn them away from the sacred soil of the gun club. He climed to the top of a tank, "focused" the interlopers through a field glass; called for a rifle and blazed away. He says he fired only to frighten the men from the vicinity of the preserves. His excuse is not tenable in view of the fact that his bullet found its billet. He will now be tried for—well, say manslaughter; although the incident has all the hideous look of a cold blooded, deliberate murder. The ultimate consequence of this wanton act will have a very depressing effect on the "preservation of game" by private law on private grounds. There is not a game preserve in California that will be safe from poachers. If the gamekeepers of these preserves are not to be permitted to shoot poachers, the poachers will not hesitate to take that chance in their quest for game. The "preserve" is regarded as an obsolete feudal privilege; it is an anachronism in the twentieth century in California; and the hunters, the real sportsmen and the pot-hunters will so regard it. Hereafter the wild game of this State will be killed wherever it is found. It belongs to all the people and they will assert their right to take it in any place, however "private" or however closely "preserved."

The Spectator

The Ready Writer From Gotham

It has turned out as might have been expected that James Clarence Harvey, the versmith of the Lamb's Club, who won a bet in the Family Club by writing a song in ten minutes, is more of a faker than a genius. The members of the Family Club, by the way, were not the only clubmen who paid homage to the fulgurant scribbler from New York. Harvey attended the Bohemian Club jinks in the grove, and there he made a prodigious hit among the captains of industry from Battery and Sansome streets by exhibiting his clairvoyant facility in literary production. He pretended to be able to dash off a group of couplets on any old subject at a moment's notice, and he was kept busy vindicating his marvellous power. He recited a poem at the jinks which was pronounced by certain eminent critics from the Merchants' Exchange equal to the finest compositions in the English language. And of course it was impromptu. The local color was evidence of the fact that it had been written in the grove. It was an inspiration. Mr. Harvey's admirers concluded that he had wireless communication with the Muses. The only member of the club who was not enthusiastic was Mr. James D. Phelan, who does not confine his reading to his scrapbook and the effusions of the mercantile agencies. Mr. Phelan did not enthuse because he was familiar with some of the lines. He told a friend that the first and last verses were from one of John Boyle O'Reilly's poems and that in the others Harvey had parodied O'Reilly. Mr. Phelan much preferred the original production despite the local color and clever local gags.

A Tree With a Pedigree

Pedigrees derived from the Napoleonic regime may not be as desirable or as aristocratic in families as are those which have grown gray with age and are lost in the backward abysm of antiquity, but a pedigreed vegetable sourcing its ancestry in the tomb of Bonaparte is something worthy of record. I have a potted willow in my conservatory that is lineally descended from the weeping willow (Salix Babylonica) that grows over the original grave of Napoleon on that "sullen isle" where died this "throneless homicide." It was given to me by Charlie Yale who received its parent from Senator Perkins, who procured the grandsire from the willow that waves above the grave of Washington at Mount Vernon, which was grown from a cutting from the willow that weeps for him

> "Whose game was empires, and whose stakes were thrones; > Whose table earth—whose dice were human bones."

Thus far I trace my scion of the willow trees that grew on the graves of a conquered conqueror, and a rebel patriot who founded the freest republic on earth, through the gardens of a Senator of the nation and a citizen beloved by those who know him as I know him. Some day I shall ask the College of Heraldry to put a few more links in the pedigree of my willow tree; perhaps I shall find that it is of a still more royal descent; perhaps the willow that weeps over the empty tomb on St. Helena wept over the tomb of Charlemagne, planted there from one that wept beside the tomb of Alexander, which came from the willow that grew by the waters of Babylon upon which the mourning daughters of Judah hung their harps and under which they grieved in their captivity. For verily I believe that in my potted willow runs a sap to make plebeian by comparison the best blood of all the Howards.

Improving the Old Job

The rumor is gaining wide circulation in the School Department that Joseph O'Connor, who was appointed a school director by Mayor Taylor, intends to resign before long, and resume his duties as Principal of the Mission High School. For this rumor I can find no foundation save that Mr. O'Connor was recently instrumental in having the salaries of school principals raised. Before Mr. O'Connor was appointed a School Director the salary of the Principal of the Mission High School was $3000 a year. The salary is now $4000 a year, and the supposition naturally is that Mr. O'Connor regards his old jo bas more desirable than ever. Of course he will not have the slightest difficulty in getting reinstated.

Mrs. Newlywed—"My dear, what interior decorations appeal to your taste?"
Mr. Newlywed—"Beefsteak and onions."

Boss Casey's Waterloo

"The best laid plans of mice and men oft gang agley." I'm never sure of the dialect that goes with this apophthegm, but of the patness of the application which I am about to make I am quite certain. Ever since the election of Mayor Taylor his sponsors and mentors have been preoccupied with plans for insuring the re-election of the Hon. Frank H. Dunne to the Superior Bench. In furtherance of this absorbing design all the machinery of the Administration has been employed, first, to capture the works of the Labor Party, and secondly, to secure the endorsement of the Republican convention. In the first of these enterprises the Dunne cabal met with gratifying success. Mayor Taylor having kindly distributed patronage with a view to giving Michael Casey control of the Labor Party, that distinguished labor agitator succeeded in extinguishing the power of the Schmitz-McCarthy element. Casey, acting as the agent of the Spreckels-Phelan sanhedrim, made himself the dictator of the machine which formerly was manipulated in the interest of Abe Ruef. Casey by planting influential union men at the municipal pie wagon became the Boss of organized labor. Then the Bulletin, which in the days when Casey was identified with the Schmitz administration, vituperated him bitterly for his delinquencies, proceeded to belaud him for his wonderful achievements in the Public Works Department. In the columns of the Bulletin Casey was pictured as a wizard. No man had ever equaled Casey as a street repairer. Casey saved more money for the taxpayers than they ever contributed for the support of the city. Nobody could compare with Casey for executive ability. And all the while Casey was doing politics for Dunne. Casey was supreme at the primary election. Casey was the whole shooting match on Labor Day, and despite the protest of the Barbers' Union, for which Casey didn't give a continental Amsterdam, the Hon. E. J. Livernash, the loudest if not the sweetest singer in all the Bulletin's choir, was appointed official orator. Finally (to come the climax of Casey's achievements) Casey organized the Labor Party convention. And until a week ago everything seemed lovely with the goose hanging high.

The Catastrophe

In all the Labor Party, until a week ago, there was no sign of a rift in the lute, and it seemed as if no dissatisfaction could breathe the same air with the Hon. Michael Joseph Casey. A week ago the first note of discord was sounded. It grated on the porch of the Hon. E. J. Livernash's far-flung ear. With that capacious member to the ground Livernash became sensible of a suspicious rumble. In hot haste he communicated with Casey, and Michael, alarmed at the report that the machine had slipped a cog, streaked it about town in quest of information. When later on he reported to Livernash there was consternation in the Dunne camp. Casey had learned that his delegates were off the reservation and dancing. And for no other reason than that they were expected to swallow Dunne. The news was shocking if not incredible. Who would have supposed that after all the scheming, plotting and planning to persuade the plain pee-pul that Dunne was their one and only friend they would repudiate him and show symptoms of nausea at the mention of his name? The phenomenon was inexplicable. Chagrined but not hopeless Casey undertook to whip the recalcitrants into line. Personally he pleaded with the delegates and exhorted them to vote for Dunne. Just before the nomirations were made he threatened one of the Republican candidates, who had some strength in the convention, that he would be opposed if he failed to swing his votes to the Bulletin's pet. But the threat was in vain. Dunne's name was hissed and hooted, and on a secret ballot he received sixteen votes. According to the Spreckels-Phelan organs the catastrophe was brought about by the higher-ups whose sinister influence is all-pervasive. Has Casey sold out to the higher-ups?

The Significance Of It

Unfortunately for those who would have us believe that the repudiation of Judge Dunne was compassed by a sinister influence the candidates before the Labor Convention were voted on by secret ballot. Than this method there is no better way of evoking an honest expression of opinion. Judge Dunne's supporters may bray and screech, and rant and roar, and scorch and scarify, but they cannot convince any sensible person that the obedient but ignorant tool of the graft prosecution was turned down at the instigation of the higher-ups. The fact is that the union men of San Francisco do not approve of Judge Dunne's conduct in the Schmitz case. Among them are many who have no doubt of Schmitz's guilt, but neither have they any doubt that the conduct of his trial was infamous. The hissing of Judge Dunne in the Republican and Labor conventions is in my opinion of great significance. I think it may be safely interpreted as an expression of public contempt. Which reminds me of a prediction I made in these columns about the time that Judge Dunne eructated his spleen against the Court of Appeal. I predicted that the passion of the mob would subside in time and that Judge Dunne would be found out. And now that it appears that he has been found out I am rather pleased with the procrastination of the Supreme Court in his case. As there are more ways of killing a dog than choking him to death with butter, so, too, there are more ways of ridding the bench of a judge in whom is blended the qualities of a Jeffreys and a Shallow than kicking him into oblivion.

Art Marked Down

The United States government will pay $10,000 for a statue of Commodore Sloat to be erected on the bluff overlooking the Presidio de Monterey. "Prizes" for the best designs are also offered—first prize, $250; second prize, $150. The only objection offered by sculptors who would be likely to compete in this monumental contest is to the effect that the materials for the statue would cost more than the amount offered for the completed work by the national Government. I would offer an amendment tc the objection in a statement that, compared with the "prizes" offered by the publishers of America for "the best short story, not exceeding 5000 words," the "prize" offered to the sculptors of the nation for this design is beggarly. These publishers would be ashamed to offer less than a dollar a word for "the best short story not exceeding 5000 words." And it is not an adequate retort on the part of the United States Government in this instance to say that any self-respecting short-story writer would be ashamed to be the author of some of the prize-winners in these short-story contests. Which reduces the matter to this simple analysis: Either Commodore Sloat is worthy of a statue or he is not; if he is worthy of a statue it ought to be a good statue; the Government cannot get a good statue unless it is willing to pay a good price; if Commodore Sloat is not worthy of a statue, a cheap one is dear at any price. I wonder if the national Government has the slightest idea of the real worth of art? I wonder if the national Government has the slightest idea of the cost of art to the artist? It is my firm belief that the first impulse of the national Government was to have this statue cast in bronze with the intention of awarding the contract to the Steel Trust, but was diverted from its purpose on learning that the Trust was up to its neck in Government contracts for blow-hole armor plates for the navy and could not undertake a picayune $10,000 naval hero statue. So the national Government offered the job to the sculptors of the nation for one-tenth the price they would have paid to the Steel Trust.

Career of a California Princess

After two years of strenuous opposition the old Prince de Broglie has suceeded in separating his son from Estelle Alexander, a California girl, who claims that two marriages bind her hard and fast to the young Prince. Never for a moment has the old aristocrat relaxed his insistent efforts to have these marriages annulled and to break the heart tie binding the doting young couple. The de Broglie are said to be a very rich and very influential family in the aristocracy of France, proud of their name and jealous of their standing. Their son's alleged entanglement outraged their sense of the proprieties and the international notoriety which quickly followed smirched the family name. It dealt with the infatuation at first sight of the young couple, a hot-headed elopement, a flight around the world to escape an enraged husband, a hasty marriage, a bitter contention over the ceremony. the disinheritance of a princeling, his persistent suits to recover his ancestral rights and the sensational efforts of the wife to go upon the stage in order to raise sufficient funds to support her husband in his demands.

HOTEL SAVOY SEATTLE

San Francisco, Paris, London, Chicago and New York, where all the principals in this colorful melodrama were well known, have followed the developments with lively interest.

Her First Marriage

Miss Estelle Alexander, the leading figure in the drama, is a California girl, born near Sonoma. Her mother, Sophia Freud, came to this city from Budapesth. While still a young girl Miss Freud married Lyman A. Alexander, now of New Mexico, but at that time the owner of a big ranch near Sonoma. Estelle was one of five chlidren born to them. Later there was a divorce and all the children went to live with the mother. Some time afterwards Mrs. Alexander married Edward H. Clay, a son of Mrs. Clay, the second wife of Senator Jones. Being a strikingly pretty girl Estelle determined to follow the advice of friends and go upon the operatic stage. Through various influences she managed to reach Paris and gain the favor of Victor Capoul, director of the opera. She was making very excellent progress with her singing when along came Dan Cupid and started the series of pranks that played such havoc with the hearts of several swains and eventually upset the plans of the aristocratic de Broglie family. Among Estelle's admirers in those conservatoire days was a Prussian, Sidney Veit. He was a wealthy importer with Paris and New York connections. They were married. Very soon Mrs. Veit began to complain that the Prussian was too jealous, too tyrannical, so she returned alone to the kindly freedom of her old studio.

Her Meeting With the Prince

Then came the event which changed her life. One day several visitors called at her studio. Among them was a young man who was introduced simply as M. de Broglie. With him were his mother, his sister and his brother Jacque, who later married the daughter of the Prince of Wagram. It was a case of love at first sight and the two promptly confessed that they could not live without each other. But what about husband Veit? The ardent lovers quickly settled that problem by eloping, thereby forcing him to get a divorce. This action created a great sensation in Paris. Mrs. Veit being free the Prince wanted to marry her at once, but under the French law the marriage could not take place without the consent of the head of the house, and this consent the irate Prince de Broglie refused in strong language to give. So the two fled to Italy and were quietly married by a priest near Milan. The de Broglies refused to recognize such a marriage, threatened the young Prince with arrest and the fond couple fled to America. They were married again in Chicago in August, two years ago, with the blessing of the bride's family.

Other Entanglements

The ordinary outsider might think that after these two marriages some sort of a matrimonial tie existed between the couple, but the old Duke de Broglie still steadfastly insists that it is "no marriage." The situation is complicated by several other entanglements entered into by the amorous young prince before he met Mrs. Veit. When twenty-six years old he married the Baronne des Deslandes, who at the age of seventeen had married Compte de Fleury, the son of General Fleury. As the latter marriage was a family affair brought about against her will it was annulled in 1894 by the Pope. The old Prince de Broglie succeeded in separating his son and Mme. Deslandes because he had not given his consent to their union. Later he brought suit aginst Mme. Deslandes in an effort to enjoin her from using the de Broglie titles. After the Chicago marriage of the Prince and Mrs. Veit they continued to live in that city. The old Prince de Broglie sent his emissaries there to work upon his son's mind and in this way and through promises made in a secret correspondence he succeeded in gradually winning the young Prince away from his wife and child. The Princess de Broglie has often threatened to go upon the stage in order to raise the necessary funds with which to equip her husband in the contest for a recognition of their rights in the de Broglie titles and estates; she may take that step now in order to raise funds to make a fight for the recognition of her own rights as a wife, for that is what she must do now against the stubborn and intrepid old Prince de Broglie.

A Family Worth Knowing

I have been looking up the de Broglie family in the French peerage and I find that the Prince who deserted his wife is the degenerate scion of some of the most illustrious sires and grandsires of France. Comte Victor Maurice de Broglie, born 1634, died 1727, was a marshal of France who distinguished himself in the wars of Louis IV; Francois Marie, first Duc de Broglie, son of Victor Maurice, born 1671, died 1745, was also a marshal of France and contributed a page of glory to the history of his country; Victor Francois, Duc de Broglie, born 1718, died 1804, son of Francois Marie, was marshal of France, fought in the Seven Years' War at Hastenbeck and Rossbach, commanded at the battle of Bergen, was minister of war to Louis XIV, flung his baton in the face of the Revolutionary proletariat, abandoned his country and died in the Russian service; Claude Victor, Prince de Broglie, born at Paris, 1757, died for the principles of his order 1794, son of Victor Francois, was a French politician, President of the National Convention in 1791, refused to recognize the decree of August 10, 1792, and suffered the penalty of the guillotine under sentence of the revolutionary tribunal; Achille Charles Leonce Victor, Duc de Broglie, son of Claude Victor, born 1785, died 1870, French statesman and peer of France, Minister of the Interior, Public Worship and Instruction in 1831 and Minister of Foreign Affairs from 1832 to 1836, husband of Albertine Ida Gustoavine de Stael, daughter of the famous French author; and Jacques Victor Albert, son of Achille Charles Leonce Victor, born 1821, French statesman, publicist and historian, ambassador to London 1871, premier 1873-74 and 1877, and author of an epochal work entitled, "L'Eglise et l'empire romain au 4 siecle" (1856). The husband of the lady who was Miss Alexander is a blot on the 'scutcheon of his house. What would the hero Broglie of Rossbach think of a Broglie that could keep a mistress on the bounty of a wife and then accuse that wife of "dishonorable conduct" to rid himself of what he regarded as a plebeian incumbrance? And that other who perished

The Rise of Maxine Elliott

Maxine Elliott, the American beauty, has been sued for divorce. What an eventful career this woman has had! Something like twelve years ago she was pretty Bessie McDermott, of Oakland, the daughter of a retired sea captain from Maine. There were two sisters and the younger, Gertrude, who is now the wife of Forbes Robertson, the distinguished English actor, was then at Snell's Seminary. One day Bessie married her cousin, a ball player. With him she went to New York, where for a time she kept a few boarders during a trying period. Then she drifted on the stage and for a season played small parts with the Daly company. After gaining some experience she joined the Frawley company in this city at the Columbia Theatre. Goodwin happened along to play a season at the Baldwin Theatre, saw the fair Maxine and became her slave at first sight. His case was so hopeless that it became the talk of the town. One evening when he was entertaining the ox-eyed Junoesque Maxine at dinner, he was so reluctant to leave her that he kept his Baldwin audience waiting till 9 o'clock.

Her Divorce, Marriage and Separation

At that time Goodwin was arranging for an Australian tour. Blanch Walsh was his leading lady, but after seeing Miss Elliott he persisted in signing her. Frawley forced him to pay a handsome sum for the release, but Goodwin deemed her worth any price and triumphantly carried her away as a member of his company. It was after her return to this country that she obtained a divorce from her husband, from whom she had long been separated, and married Goodwin. That was in 1898. It was Goodwin's third venture into matrimony. From that time on Maxine Elliott made rapid strides in her profession and soon accumulated a fortune. She is a shrewd and a careful woman in worldly affairs and rarely allows her emotions to sway her judgment. A few years after her marriage she wrote a friend here that she had saved one hundred thousand dollars besides possessing titles to three valuable pieces of real estate. Early in 1903 rumors of differences between her and Nat Goodwin began to circulate and they were given vivid colors when it was definitely announced that they would star in different orbits. Since then they have gone their separate ways. Success has continued to follow the beautiful Maxine. In London she scored quite a triumph professionally and socially. Since the separation from his wife Goodwin has found no play that has enabled him to win success. His London and New York seasons were fizzles. It was while rusticating here after one of those fiascos that he announced his retirement from the stage and his embarkation into the breezy, jolly life of a mining promoter. He loaned his name to a Nevada brokcrage firm and with its dexterous use efforts were made to sell large blocks of mining shares in eastern fields. Later the call of the footlights prevailed in Goodwin's blood and he returned to the circuit. Denting hard this western interlude in his career was the Edna Goodrich episode. Every Florodora girl has a bunch of lively romances and the Goodwin-McMillan affair is the last of the fluffy ruffles entanglements of the fair Edna. After a hot pursuit by both parties, Harry McMillan not only lost the pretty actress but several other things.

Goodwin Denied the Story

At the time his engagement with Miss Goodrich was broken off a story was circulated to explain how Goodwin had accomplished the trick. According to the tale the ingenious comedian managed somehow to receive a copy of the papers in the suit Maxine Elliott was about to bring against him. It was said that in the complaint Edna Goodrich was named as co-respondent. Harry McMillan's mother had ceaselessly opposed the marriage of her son with the actress and when Goodwin artfully contrived to have a copy of this divorce complaint laid before her she redoubled her efforts to break off the match. Goodwin roundly denied this story at the time, but then and later all his actions indicated his intense desire to capture Edna Goodrich as his leading lady at any cost. His friends believe his action in the present divorce proceedings continues to emphasize the bent of his mind. The gifted comedian is given to very theatrical effects when off the stage and the sealed divorce complaint, which he has just filed in Reno, does not necessarily mean that it is loaded with scandal. Goodwin is capable of filing a very ordinary complaint with face so grave as to excite even the theatrical world. During her stage career Maxine Elliott has been exceedingly circumspect and not the slightest whisper has been breathed against her name in this country or in England. Ever since the sensational Goodrich-McMillan-Goodwin episode there have been rumors that Maxine Elliott was about ready to commence divorce proceedings. Goodwin used to be a great bluffer at poker and some of his old cronies suspect that he has boldly anticipated events and has stepped into the limelight with the first gun. Is it loaded? Is the suit a sealed bluff to be used as a compromise with the case now being prepared against him by his wife.

his head and was about to punish a man for contempt of court without the essential formalities. If Henry Ach had not called his attention to the familiar statutory procedure the Court's decree would have been absolutely worthless.

Colonel Mutt—Strange that Lawlor should lose his head!

Major Mentor—Strange? Not at all. There is always method in Lawlor's aberrations. You didn't see him lose his head when he was soaking the attorneys for the defense. He kept his mental poise then. But young Oliver is connected with the prosecution, you know, and whatever the prosecution does is in the interest of justice, the kind of justice Lawlor is qualified by instinct and nature to administer.

Colonel Mutt—That's right. Lawlor is a great judge. The boys at the club have great admiration for the little judge. They say that the way he went after young Oliver proved that he plays no favorites.

Major Mentor—That's just what it did. Did they say what he proved by his refusal to let Henry Ach cross-examine the gumshoe artist who detailed young Oliver to interview the jurors?

Colonel Mutt—No, they didn't say anything about that.

Major Mentor—Which shows that they don't appreciate the little judge at all. In an emergency of that kind Lawlor makes Dunne look like a lobster.

Colonel Mutt—That's right. Lawlor never lets them waste any of his time badgering men on the witness stand.

Major Mentor—Quite true. Besides he abhors scandals. If Ach had been permitted to cross-examine the gumshoe artist he might have involved Heney and Burns and the whole gang and the effect would have been dreadful.

Colonel Mutt—Do you think that was Ach's design?

Major Mentor—I'm quite sure it was. Ach you know is a very bad man. He's actually trying to keep Ruef out of jail, and if they'd give him half a chance he'd do just what he says he'd do.

Colonel Mutt—What does he say he'd do?

Major Mentor—He says he'd put the gang behind the prosecution in jail for the crimes they've committed.

Colonel Mutt—But of course he can't do that.

Major Mentor—Not with Lawlor on the bench. The little judge will protect his friends to the last ditch.

Colonel Mutt—Do you think they'll finally get Ruef into jail?

Major Mentor—I don't think he has any more chance in Lawlor's court than a cat has in hell without claws. The little judge, in my opinion, will see that the proper kind of jury is impaneled, even though it should become necessary to canonize every private detective in town and disqualify nine-tenths of the population.

Colonel Mutt—But as everybody in town knows that Ruef is guilty it oughtn't to be necessary to go that far.

Major Mentor—Nor would it be necessary if Ruef were not being prosecuted by greater rascals than himself.

Thackeray's Dramatic Climaxes

Do you remember that startling dramatic passage at the close of the nineteenth chapter of "Pendennis," in which it is related that the hero whom Thackeray loved so dearly came at last to the Degree Examinations; wherein it is narrated that many a young man of his year whose hobnailed shoes Pen had derided, and whose face and coat he had caricatured—many a man whom he had treated with scorn in the lecture room or crushed with his eloquence in the debating club—many of his own set who had not half his brains, but a little regularity and constancy of occupation, took high places in the honors or passed with decent credit? And the questions: "Where in the list was Pen, the superb Pen, the wit and dandy, Pen, the poet and orator? Ah, where was Pen, the widow's darling and sole pride?" And the answer: "Let us hide our heads, and shut up the page. The lists came out; and a dreadful rumor rushed through the university that Pendennis of Boniface was plucked!" This and two other splendid climaxes—the thrashing of Lord Steyne by Rawdon Crawley which compelled the fair and fickle Becky to admire her husband in spite of herself, "strong, brave and victorious"; and the three lines in which it is told that there was no more firing heard at Brussels; the pursuit had rolled away; darkness came down on the field and city; and Amelia was praying for George, who was lying on his face, dead, with a bullet through his heart—are, in my opinion, the best that Thackeray wrote, if we except the description of the death scene in "The Newcomes."

"Activities" of the Berkeley Student

These forgotten fragments from the books of an almost forgotten author, who was a great "seller" in his day, are not recalled for the vain purpose of arousing modern interest in such an ancient subject, but with the first of my allusions to point a Berkeley moral for the adornment of my somewhat rambling tale. Berkeley as it is daily epitomized in the press of this city is, apparently (and I sincerely hope only apparently) a place of mild riot and constant revelry rather than a rugged steep of Parnassus, a rough climb on Helicon, an academic grove wherein peripatetic philosophers preach the wisdom of the ages to eager disciples and ever-craving scholars. On the surface of the daily news from the State University and the Berkeley High School it is more perceptible that Pendennis is wasting his precious time in "frat activities" or athletic "team work" and that his sister is frivoling her best hours at "sorority" soirees and Greek letter receptions. That this effort on the part of the students to maintain the "classy" reputation of Berkeley as an "educational center" by subordinating the educational purpose of the schools to the "social duties" and the "team work" of the students, is founded in some sort of truth, is confirmed by the report from the Berkeley High School announcing that "on account of the scholarship requirements, which demand that pupils must attain a grade of 70 per cent in two out of four studies in order to compete on athletic teams, five of the veteran players have been forced to leave the football team." Good for the faculty of the Berkeley High School—as far as their requirements go. Let us hope that the standard of scholarship next year will be even higher, to the purpose that Pendennis shall not be a second time plucked. The schools at Berkeley are not supported by the taxpayers merely to give "classiness" to "classy" young men and women who prefer "class" to their classes. We are not training the young men for Olympic games nor fitting young women to "shine in society." The only legitimate "prestige" at Berkeley is that which lifts to honors and a degree. The University is not a school for snobs; nor should the Berkeley High School be a kindergarten for athletes in knickerbockers and peg-topped "pants," or a finishing school for short-frocked girls aping the manners of their elder sisters of the University "sororities" whose glory is chiefly obvious in their ostentatious "pins" inscribed with Greek letters that are really Greek to the understanding and comprehension of the wearers.

The Raging "Fires of St. John"

The controversy over "The Fires of St. John" has been fed for several years past by the hot remarks exchanged between McKee Rankin and Charles Swickard. When Rankin was out here last July the two men had a heated debate over the old question and the ground was laid for the action that led to the arrest of Nance O'Neil and Rankin in New York this week. It was right after one of these belligerent tilts that Rankin voiced his sense of the situation in this fashion: "Years ago when I was managing the California Theatre, Charley Swickard was playing in the cast of "Meg Merilles" for me. He had a knack for translating plays from the German. Several of these were not copyrighted and he thought they might be used. Four years later Swickard and I ran across each other in New York and he showed me a translation of Suderman's play, "Johannisfeuer." I was dated for that year and could not do anything till the following season, 1902. Then I tackled the play and named it "The Fires of St. John" and adapted it for stage purposes. The scene in the third act where the fires go out was absolutely my own idea of the use of an old stage device. As an acknowledgment of my aid in staging the production and as a favor to Miss O'Neil for playing in it, Mr. Swickard offered us the play as a gift. I declined to take it for nothing and offered him two and one-half per cent of the gross receipts. Then he wanted a job in the company, and I told him he was a singer, not an actor.. Then he sold the play, without copyrighting to an eastern company, which published it in book form, using my stage business and Miss O'Neil's picture, without the consent of either of us. Eight months after the original production the company deposited two copies in Washington and took out a barren copyright. Now comes Mr. Swickard and demands high royalties on a play he took from another man."

Rankin as a Fighter

"To avoid any controversy I had a new translation made by Otto Von Klock. In order to secure a copyright upon a play two printed copies must be filed with the Librarian of Congress, previous to a public performance and these books must be printed by American labor and with American material all through. The trouble in the theatrical business is that there are too many bushwhackers abroad levying tribute under the copyright law. A stock company recently played "Charley's Aunt" in San Jose. Selwyn & Co., the reputed agents, promptly demanded $175 royalty. The manager of the company laughed in his face and told him the play was never copyrighted. Suit was brought, but it was all a bluff and was never prosecuted. Later the same stock company produced "TheAmazons." Claim was at once made for $350 royalty. It was scoffed at; another bluff suit was instituted; like the other it was dropped. Plays which belong to rightful owners should be carefully protected; but, as I said, these watchful bushwhackers lie around and appropriate other people's property and attempt to levy tribute on it. I'm a born fighter and I won't stand for it. Let them take it into the courts if they have right on their side." This is just what Swickard has done.

Candid Friend—"As your husband died intestate, you will, of course, get a third."
Merry Widow—"Oh, I hope to get a fourth. He was my third, you know."

Counting the Orators

It has been determined by the Republican State Central Committee that it will depend entirely on local orators for its spellbinding material in this campaign. There will be no demand upon Chairman Hitchcock of the National Committee for stump talent. If California is to be held in the Republican column it will be through the efforts of our own Ciceros. But where are they? Let us name them. There's Chester Rowell and Grove Johnson and—and—what's the matter with my memory. Let me begin again—Chester Rowell; that's one orator whose blast is worth a thousand men; Grove Johnson; another orator whose blast is probably worth two or perhaps three thousand votes; and—foiled again! Of course there are others; some of them are dead and some of them are in the Roosevelt-Lincoln League, but I am sure that there are more than two Republican orators in California able to view anything with alarm and to point with pride at the record of the grand old party. But for the life of me I can't recall their names; the hiatus is mine, the lacuna cannot be charged to the Republican party of California. When the proper time comes the shouting captains will appear and their name will be legion. We shall hang spellbound on their utterances; our ears will be filled with the sound of their eloquence; our hearts will be thrilled by their appeals to our patriotism. Orators! Go to; oratory is the very breath of the Republican nostrils; orators in the Republican party are as the sands on the shore, as the leaves that flutter on the autumn breeze, as the stars on the sea when the blue wave rolls nightly o'er deep Gallilee—Chester Rowell and Grove Johnson are not the only pebbles on the beach either.

Violating the Historical Verities

Evelyn B. Keck, an authoress unknown to me but not therefore necessarily unknown to fame, has written a story entitled "The Americanizing of Tony Silva." The story purports to be "an incident which occurred in San Francisco during the late (and early) Spanish-American (or, more accurately, the American-Spanish) war." It relates that Jose Carillo, a native-born kid of Spanish extraction, whose father, a fisherman, forbade him to salute the American flag, thumped a Portuguese lad named Tony Silva for making mouths at the flag aforesaid. Tony, after his licking, falls into the bay and is rescued by Jose, who, aided and abetted by some customs officers, compels the defeated "dago," as he is called, to not only salute the buttons on the customs officers' coat and the flag, but to repeat after Jose the invocation: "I give my hand and my heart to my country; one country, one language, one flag." Then the dripping boys go away locked in each other's embrace. It is a pretty good story of its kind; but the impartial critic cannot say much for the kind of story it happens to be. In the first place there could not be a California Carillo who would forbid his son to salute the American flag. The Carillos have been Californians for more than a hundred years; the fathers of the up-to-date Carillos were born under the American flag; their fathers were rebels against the sovereignty of Spain at the time of the declaration of Mexican independence, and subsequently assisted Sloat, and Stockton, and Kearney, and Fremont in bringing Alta California under the American flag, a flag that was perhaps a foreign flag in the eyes of Evelyn B. Keck's ancestors contemporary with the ancestors of the Carillos. It is not right to pervert the history of California for the misinformation of young Californians even to teach a lesson in patriotism. Such methods of inculcating civic morality is perilously near to cant. Moreover it has a tendency to breed a race prejudice in a cosmopolitan community where we are endeavoring to make American citizens out of aliens by our example rather than by such precepts as are written by Evelyn B. Keck.

A Story With Reverse Action

In the second place it is only necessary to reverse the situation as depicted by the writer of this story to expose the utter absurdity of it. Suppose it had been an American father in Spain and that a Portuguese boy had insisted that the son of this American father should salute the Spanish flag, saying, "I give my hand and my heart to my country; one country, one language, one flag"? How would this strike the ultra-patriotic Evelyn B. Keck? Would she disapprove of the American father's effort to keep his boy loyal to the country of his ancestors? Would she applaud the Portuguese boy's method of compelling unwilling patriotism? Let her answer to her conscience or her common sense. Or suppose that the scene is laid in Portugal (or more likely, in the Western Islands, from which most of our "Portuguese" come). Imagine a Portuguese ruffian turning the American tables on a weaker American kid by licking him into submussion to a tyranny that compelled hi mto salute the flag of Portugal and pledge allegiance to the Portuguese nation, the Portuguese language and the Portuguese flag? It's a poor story that won't work both ways; and this Evelyn B. Keck story doesn't seem to work either way or any way.

Billboarding Majesty

Emperor William of Germany visited the North Cape last summer and was so impressed with the solemn grandeur of the scenery that he expressed a desire to set the seal of his imperial approbation upon it. The local authorities of the island of Marero, although square-headed Norwegians and in nowise bound to feel flattered at this condescension by an alien royalty, hastened to let the name "Hohenzollern" be painted on the face of the Cape in letters fifteen feet high. Hohenzollern is the family name of the emperor and it is also the name of his yacht. The inscription is nine feet seven inches taller than his royal highness and is plainly visible a thousand yards at sea. It is invisible from the horizon. The emperor probably thought that his sub-arctic billboard would loom lone and lasting amid the majestic solitude of that far northern waste of land and sea and cold gray sky. Otherwise Omniscient he was, in this instance, mistaken. First came a lot of German tourist-steamer captains who painted their own names on the royal rock; then an enterprising London chocolate maker painted the advertisement of his business over the imperial patronymic; subsequently the drummer for an English boot blacking added the stereotype enconium of his "line" to the bunch, utilizing all the others, including "Hohenzollern," as signatories to a fulsome "testimonial" indorsing his blacking. All of which may be regarded as the grossest "violated majesty" of modern times, surpassing even those rude stanzas written by Captain Coghlan of the United States Navy in which the emperor of all the Germans is depicted as speaking of himself and God and relegating the Deity to the second place. His majesty may derive one consolation, however, from the event. If none of the others had painted themselves on that dreary rock of farthest north in Europe, some irreverent Yankee democrat, touring the northern sea on a Cook's round trip Norway excursion ticket, would have leaned over the port taffrail of the "personally conducted" steamboat and loudly inquired, in the hearing of his fellow passengers: "Hohenzollern? Hohenzollern?—and who in hell is Hohenzollern?" This would have been more humiliating than what happened to Ozymandias, "king of kings," on whose works the Mighty were bade to look and despair, but of which nothing survived save "two vast and trunkless legs of stone," standing in the air, and near them, half sunk, "a shattered visage" lying, while "round the decay of that colossal wreck, boundless and bare the lone and level sands stretched far away."

The Death Trap of the Ages

From the advance sheets of the October Sunset I learn that a discovery of great value to science has been made near Los Angeles by scientists of the State University. According to Professor Merriam, who tells the story, the asphalt beds on the line of the railway between Hollywood and Sawtelle contain one of the most remarkable accumulations of prehistoric remains in the world. While this discovery may not serve to throw any new light on the periods of organic development, it will certainly add to human knowledge and also to the romance of nature. Skeletons have been found of animals that pursued their carnivorous instincts whole milleniums before man became master of the jocund earth. The collection of bones in the asphalt beds is the largest ever found. These beds, it appears, were in the nature of a death-trap. "When asphalt has accumulated so as to form a pitchy lake," says Professor Merriam, "it presents a surface which looks very much like water, at least in a dim light," and from the presence of the large number of carnivora in the asphalt deposits it is evident that the animals were trapped while attempting to reach struggling birds or small mammals that had been caught in the tar. Animals are similarly snared to this day in Ventura county. Among the most interesting of the fossil remains are those of the sabre-tooth tiger. Until the discovery scientists' only skull in the British Museum. Scores of saber-tooth skulls have been found in the asphalt beds, and also one complete skeleton of a tiger the size of an African lion. Professor Merriam's story is of absorbing interest; as is also, by the way, the second of Editor Aiken's series of articles dealing with notable features of this far western country. Last month he told us of the surprising fertility of Imperial Valley, which now contains 300,000 cultivated acres from which came $2,000,000 worth of products last year. In the current number Mr. Aiken tells us of the Valley of the Rogue where scalping knives have been made into pruning hooks.

Wilson in Wall Street

"Jack" Wilson, broker, bon viviant, and popular clubman, is now numbered among the financiers of Wall Street. He has been admitted into the charmed circle of the New York Stock Exchange. But Mr. Wilson has no intention of deserting San Francisco. He will continue to conduct his financial operations from his headquarters in this city. And considering his present connections these operations will be of considerable magnitude, for he is now one of the most influential brokers in the country. Besides having a seat in the New York Exchange and the San Francisco Stock and Bond Exchange he is also a member of the Chicago Board of Trade, and I hear that in addition to his headquarters in this city and his office in New York he will soon open offices in Los Angeles and Pasadena. Very few Californians have obtained admission to the New York Stock Exchange. For a man must have something more than the price, which, by the way, is not very far below $100,000; he must have the confidence of the most exclusive financial circles.

By R E. Mulcahy

As is usual, the unexpected happened in Wall Street securities. The unquestionable strength shown in securities during the previous week caused a general feeling of safety to prevail among investors and speculators generally. The market started off during the past week showing an unsettled condition. This was most clearly illustrated in the Hill-Morgan groups with Great Northern and Northern Pacific acting as leaders in the downward course, the declining tendency soon began gathering in St. Paul, Union Pacific, Southern Pacific, and gradually took effect in every security along the line. The decline was checked temporarily on Friday, but was well in force again on Saturday. London and Berlin, as well as Paris, sold securties freely; this selling continued throughout Monday and Tuesday when the market took on the appearance of a mild panic showing stock prices for the general list from $15 to $20 per share decline from the late high prices. The cause assigned for the break was attributed to political reasons. The little interest taken in the coming election is causing Taft's political friends much uneasiness. It may be that the scare through the medium of the stock exchange may go farther than was anticipated. Nothing has as yet shown itself that would justify the present severe decline. It is more than likely the real solution of the action of the market is due to the fact that large holders of securities unloaded their speculative holdings and are now working a reaction when they can again buy back their securities in preparation of the advance that will follow the election. If one were to play from past actions of the market during Presidential campaigns, the upward tendency ought to start about October 10th and continue for a long time. The political outlook seems perfectly clear. Bryan will not be as strong as he was in his previous campaigns; the cards are plainly visible as regards the New York State election. Hughes will be traded for Taft. No matter what scares may appear between the present and election time, there can be but one result. Taft will be elected. This being the case securties must and will sell higher. The present decline has shaken out timid holders and the market is in a stronger position than it has been for some time. Railway earnings are showing steady improvement; their comparative statements have again abandoned red ink and are on the right side of the ledger. The crops are now practically assured; their aggregate is the most bountiful in the history of the country. This together with the high prices for all feed products make a very prosperous outlook; this condition cannot change for more than a year, which is about as long as most of us look ahead. The demand for our wheat this crop year may prove a very urgent one. Should Russia be quarantined on account of cholera the demand for American wheat would be sensationally strong and cause prices to soar beyond the reach of many. It is estimated that 80 per cent of the corn crop is out of the reach of frost, the remaining 20 per cent will be in to clear by September 30th. Eastern railways are putting their equipment into serviceable condition in anticipation of moving the largest tonnage ever handled in their history. All present conditions promise a prosperous future for all lines of trade. The farmer will take care of himself; he is a loaner of money instead of a borrower, as he used to be. Whenever the farmer is well to do there is not much for the rest of humanity to grumble about. A good foundation will always strengthen the upper structure; this represents the relation of the farmer to the country's prosperity. It may be considered a pretty good guide to go by. Conditions locally are showing a great amount of activity; the bond markets continue to improve and the volume of business has increased materially during the past week.

Social Prattle

By TANTALUS

The New Cotillon Leader

Mrs. C. O. Alexander has tentatively announced her intention of entering the field as a cotillon leader. For some reason Mrs. Alexander has not signed, sealed and delivered herself to the cause. It would argue oneself out of the social reckoning to infer that Mrs. Alexander has any misgivings about her requisites in the matter, as she has far more counts in her favor than several other people who have made a success of that sort of thing. Mrs. Alexander knows all the worth-while people in society and she has a talent for just this sort of thing. If the dances are finally decided on they are to be tripped across the polished floor of the new ballroom in the St. Francis. Mrs. Alexander was a Miss Carroll of Sacramento, but has made her home in San Francisco for years. After the death of her husband she went abroad with her dear friend, Mrs. Gus Spreckels, and has since taken a great many trips to Europe. The last one was in the capacity of chaperone to Miss Marie Berger, who is now Mrs. Charles Sutro. Mrs. Alexander has a very fascinating young daughter, Harriet, who is one of the debutantes in the winter bouquet of buds. A young son, Douglas, has made his home for the most part with his aunt, Mrs. Mountford Wilson, who is his mother's sister. He has just entered upon a commercial career in the employ of the Standard Oil Company.

MRS. ERNEST WILLIAMS HEWSON

Mrs. Hewson was Miss Natalie Theodora Brittan; her recent marriage was a social event in the San Carlos colony.

Dates of the Dances

A series of three dances in the beautiful new ballroom of the St. Francis hotel will mark the advent of Mrs. Alexander into the cotillon trust this winter. All of them of course will be the smartest of smart affairs and there is already lively pressure being brought to bear to get on the list. The first dance will be given in December, probably on Christmas eve, the next will be sometime in January and the third will be a Washington's birthday affair. The new ballroom will be completed in two or three weeks and the event will be celebrated by an elaborate ball given by Mrs. Henry T. Scott.

The Season's Debutantes

Fortunately the debutantes of this season do not represent such divided interests as last year's. It is difficult to make a graceful arrangement of buds if there are too many thorns on the stem. There have been seasons when so many prominent hostesses, introducing their daughters to society, stood at swords' points with each other, that a hostess had to exercise rare diplomacy in handling her young guests. Several seasons ago, a girl who has now fully conquered society, but whose mother had a strong clique up in arms, made her debut and the hostess who included her in her entertainments to the debutantes was always running against this haughty maiden or a rival who refused to sit next to her at table. This year promises a serene sky for the list which so far includes Miss Florence Hopkins, Miss Harriet Alexander, Miss Olive Wheeler, Miss Virginia Newhall, Miss Frances Newhall,

The Shorb-Sheehan Feud

Now there is talk of reprisals by way of aftermath to the episode in which Bernardo Shorb figured two weeks ago, the story of which was related in these columns last week. Young Shorb, it will be remembered, was lured into the hands of his wife's lawyers by a young woman in whose friendship he had implicit confidence. At least that is the story as it came to me, but when it was published the young woman begged the Shorb family to have it contradicted. They refused to do so. As she is quite prominent in the set which was formerly under the leadership of Mrs. Shorb White Buck, it is believed that when that lady returns to town she will warmly espouse her brother's cause and endeavor to rear a few social hurdles in the path of a certain clever young woman. And over the tea tables there is speculation over the probable attitude of Mrs. Eleanor Martin toward all persons who have espoused the Sheehan cause, and especially toward a certain young woman in whom she has at times taken an amiable interest. The Sheehan-Shorb feud has assumed large proportions since the trapping of Bernardo, and it will doubtless lead to interesting developments during the winter season.

Her First Matrimonial Venture

Mrs. Largey's father is a banker in Modesto and she was considered the blonde beauty of the county when she married Howard Taylor some ten years ago. She was only eighteen and although young Taylor came of an excellent old family there was some expression of parental displeasure as his financial status did not look above par to the county bank. The marriage came to a short stop a year or two later in the divorce court. Howard Taylor, Sr., who has made his home in New York for years, is now visiting in San Francisco. He is a successful playwright as far as production goes, every season showing one or more of his plays on the boards. Before his son married Miss Cressy he entertained some aspirations for the stage, I believe.

Cupid's Clever Work

Mrs. Howard Tayor, Jr's, marriage to John Siebe was considered a brilliant match and the couple were supposed to be devoted to each other even up to the time that they were divorced. The proceedings were so carefully muffled that no explanation has yet leaked out. At any rate Mrs. Siebe did not dent her heart beyond repair, for the pain cure offered by Mr. Largey has made it as good as new.

Is Away With Young Lochinvar

A wedding that did not serve surprise powders before or after would seem out of date in these days when Hymen has taken to acrobatic stunts. No one pays any attention to the announced plans nowadays, for the odds are all against their running on schedule time. For instance, Miss Grace Wood was to be married around the holidays to Lieutenant William Carrol Christy and her father and two sisters, who are now traveling in the East had planned to return for the wedding. But Lieutenant Christy obtained an unexpected short leave and hurrying up from Fort Apache, Arizona, carried off his bride before her friends had time to Marcel wave their hair for the wedding. The ceremony took place in Piedmont, on Wednesday last, and after a few days at the Fairmont Lieutenant Christy and his bride departed for Fort Apache.

Surprised Her Friends Again

The daily papers were not chronologically correct in their account of the heart affairs of the lady who is now the wife of Morris Sellers Largey of Butte, Montana. Their slipshod reckoning is excusable in view of the fact that since the day she waved shake a dey-dey to Modesto and changed her name from Cressy she has shown such an aptitude for matrimony that it is difficult to keep pace with her. The fact that Mr. Largey was peopling her perspective was not know even to her most intimate friends. After her divorce about a year ago from John F. Siebe, she was scheduled to take a trip around the world with the Julian Thornes, but at the last moment she followed her trunks to New York instead. Mr. Largey has been very busy since the death of his father, losing some of his inherited millions in theatrical ventures, but he stopped long enough to admire Mrs. Siebe and that settled his fate. They are married and he is to go back to Butte and attend to the interests of the estate.

Under the Orange Blossoms

Miss Eugenie Moraghan and Dr. Herbert F. Moore were quietly married in the home of the bride's sister, Mrs. Frances F. Knorp, in Jackson street, last Wednesday evening. Father Jerome Hannigan officiated. The matron of honor was Mrs. Frances Knorp and the bridesmaids were Miss Helen Sullivan and Miss Olga Hermann. John Eggers was best man. Harry Hunt and Edward Cosgriff acted as ushers. Only relatives and very intimate friends of the bride were present.

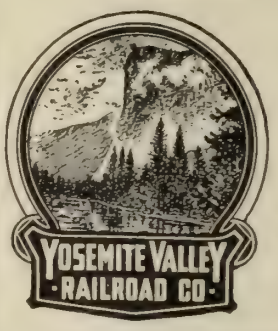
The Independent Mrs. Kohl

Mrs. Frederick Kohl is back in town looking as much like a nut-brown maiden as blonde beauty permits. The Kohls have spent all summer at their beautiful home at Tahoe and invitations to their house parties have been the most eagerly sought after billet-doux that the postman could bring. Mrs. Kohl has a varied assortment of charms, perhaps the most interesting of which is a beautiful independence of spirit which she gracefully exhibits in her relations with representatives of both factions in the feud that has so thoroughly demoralized society.

Flight of the Tennis Players



My correspondent writes that the Hotel Del Monte was crowded during the final week of the tennis tournament and there was great enthusiasm over the games, especially the finals for the championships. Saturday evening there was a monster banquet to the tennis players and their friends at which nearly a hundred guests assembled. Judge John Hunt presided and at the conclusion of the dinner presented the trophies to the successful contestants, to each of which he made an appropriate little speech. On Sunday the last of the tennis experts departed. Mr. and Mrs. George Newell Armsby, accompanied by Mr. and Mrs. J. N. Hussey, came down on Friday for a short visit. Mrs Armsby, at the dance on Saturday night, was one of three ladies wearing sheath gowns, which attracted a great deal of attention, especially as the wearers had not yet mastered the difficulties of locomotion in these skinlike costumes. Mr. and Mrs. G. H. Norrand motored over from Santa Cruz to witness the finals, as did J. S. Tobin and William H. Taylor of Burlingame. Among the arrivals from San Francisco during the week were Mr. and Mrs. L. S. Schoenfeld, Edwin S. Utley, Miss Marion Thompson, Mr. and Mrs. Bradford Webster, Mr. and Mrs. George R. Chambers, Mr. and Mrs. Laurence S. Adams, Mr. and Mrs. William A. Nelson and Dr. and Mrs. John Carol Philip.

The tea tabbies are in the throes of great excitement. They have the word of a well-known society matron living in Pacific avenue that her maid was told by the cook that the grocery delivery man was informed in strict confidence by his best girl that her brother, who is an office boy with a leading law firm, had accidentally overheard the head clerks discuss the proper drawing up of divorce papers between a prominent doctor and his wife. He is going to the club to live and she is going abroad. So there you are.

Aftermath of the Von Schroeder War

Milton Latham lies in a precarious condition in a Livermore sanitarium and his club friends and old chums are discussing ways and means to jolly up his dolorous days. Time was when most of the blue blooded friends of this son of a United States Senator and multi-millionaire banker would have scrambled to catch a careless nod from him, but time frappes many friendships, just as is did in the case of Latham's and Ned Greenway's and it isn't always the wine's fault either. Some five years ago the genial Ned took Latham under his protecting wing in a business way. For a time the gossips somehow were inclined to believe that the son of the old-time banker and railroad magnate was in training to succeed Greenway as a cotillon leader. Gradually it developed that the social Czar was exercising a great deal of shrewd diplomacy. At that time Baron von Schroeder was having a very heated tilt with the prudish elite on this side of the bay. In a great huff he took refuge in his San Rafael quarters and cut off all social and commercial dealings with San Francisco. To show his independence the Baron drew all his provender for the Hotel Rafael from other sources. His feelings toward Greenway were somewhat bitter and he dealt the little Czar a particularly cruel blow by cutting his wines off the hotel wine card. It was while in this predicament of commercial warfare that the resourceful Nestor of society sought out young Latham and his particularly strong social connections in certain quarters and began to groom him for a cotillon leader. In course of time he managed the kindly disposed Latham so that the latter in his tactful way straightened out the miserable wine tangle with von Schroeder.

Won a Rich Banker

Latham's mother was one of the famous McMullin sisters, a belle of the sixties who shared the sceptre of queen with Miss Ella Maxwell. Both girls were exceptionally beautiful and each girl had her string of beaux. Mr. Latham, who was the most prominent banker of the period, was a devoted admirer of each in turn. Rumor had it that Miss Maxwell refused him, but the elderly beau found favor in the eyes of Miss McMullin, who accepted him and was thereafter loaded with jewels and luxuries of every kind by her indulgent husband. The blue-satined coach with gilt wheels, drawn by two milk-white horses, wherein the lovely young wife took her drives abroad, was one of the sights of the day.

Had the Last Laugh

A neat little kink was given the practical jokers at the recent Van Arsdale-Kurtz wedding. The waiting auto at the door had been outrageously decorated with garish ribbons, slippers, old canes, gum shoes, and an assortment of odds and ends that trumpeted the announcement that those in the tonneau were a newly wedded couple. The arch conspirators, with convenient baskets of rice, gathered near the door to await the departure of the bridal pair. Every few minutes a servant, apparently very much interested in the lark, came up and quieted their impatience by saying, "They'll be along shortly; they're almost ready." Finally he approached and handed them a card signed by the groom. It read: "Ride in the car yourselves; you like the decorations better than we do. Good-bye. We left fifteen minutes ago by the side door."

Forthcoming Weddings

The marriage of Miss Margaret Evans James, the second daughter of Mrs. Nathaniel James, to Hartwell Craigen MacCartney will take place Wednesday evening, October 14th, at the home of Mrs. H. B. Underhill, Jr., in Vallejo street. It will be a very quiet affair, only the intimate friends of the bride and groom will be invited. Mrs. J. B. Chace, formerly Clara Underhill, and Miss Pansy Perkins will be matrons of honor, while the attractive young sisters of the bride, Misses Gladys and Cornelia James, will be the bridesmaids. Mr. J. B. Chace will be the best man. The bride is a stunning girl of rare coloring, possessing a wealth of auburn hair with brilliant dark eyes. She has spent many years in Washington.. Mr. MacCarteney is a son of the late Captain MacCarteney, U. S. N. He is an able young lawyer of Washington, D. C., where he and his bride will reside.

The wedding of Miss Maude Payne and Samuel Russell Bogue has been set for October 7th, and will be solemnized in the beautiful home of the bride's mother, Mrs. Eugenia Freeman.

Very quiet will be the wedding of Miss Sara Drum and John William Gill, on Wednesday, September 30th, in the home of Mrs. William Greer Hitchcock, in San Mateo. Only relatives of the two families will be present.

Big Conference at Pacific Grove

The fifty-fifth session of the Methodist Episcopal Conference, which was held in Pacific Grove last week, filled that pretty little village to its utmost capacity, delegates coming from all over the State. On Saturday the Army Veterans of the Conference gave their annual banquet and camp fire at the Pacific Grove Hotel. Over two hundred guests sat under a canopy of draped flags and enjoyed the feast, listening between courses to a number of addresses, one of the most interesting of which was that of Bishop Warren of Denver. Among those who registered at the Hotel last week for the Conference were Mr. and Mrs. T. Stephens of Paso Robles, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Harknes of Chico, W. H. Scott, United States army (retired), S. D. Hutsinpillar of Berkeley, Mr. and Mrs. John Stevens, Mr. and Mrs. S. W. Peters of Stockton, and Mrs W. L. Woodrow of San Jose. Other guests at the Hotel are Mr. and Mrs. A. B. Nye of Sacramento, Professor Edward Mills of Cincinnati, Mayor William Robbie and Mrs. Robbie of Chico, Congressman E. A. Hayes of San Jose and Mr. and Mrs. Rollo V. Watt of San Francisco.

Charity Fete at "The Uplands"

There will be a garden fete and street fair at "The Uplands," San Mateo, Saturday, October 3rd, for the benefit of the Bishop Armitage Orphange, and the San Mateo Red Cross Guild Hospital. The Boards of Directors are: Mrs. Henry T. Scott, Mrs. Mountford Wilson, Mrs. J. L. Flood, Mrs. G W. Gibbs, Mrs. F. J. Carolan, Mrs. Le Worne, Mrs. E. D. Baylard, Mrs. J. D. Grant, Mrs. G. A. Pope, Mrs. J. B. Crockett, Mrs. W. S. Tevis, Miss Maynard, and Mr. W. B. Gallwey, Mrs. Whitelaw Reid, Mrs. Ernest Coxhead, Mrs. W. S. Martin, Mrs. C. E. Green, Mrs. W. H. Crocker, Mrs. W. B. Tubbs, Mrs. J. Carolan, Mrs. L. I. Scott and Miss Jennie Crocker. Special conveyances will convey visitors from the electric cars to the grounds. All kinds of amusements will be afforded children and grown ups, and many attractive things will be for sale. Refreshments will be served. There will be music both afternoon and evening, and the entertainment will finish with a dance. The booths will be in charge of some of the best known ladies of San Mateo, Burlingame and Menlo Park. The cause is a very worthy one and should attract general support.

In the Social Spotlight

Mrs. W. H. Mills and her daughters, Elizabeth and Ardella, have leased their town house and will leave in a fortnight to spend the winter in the East. They contemplate several months in Europe before returning home.

Mr. and Mrs. H. P. Livermore, with their daughter Elizabeth, left this week for Europe. There they will meet Miss Edith Livermore, who has been living abroad for some time, and the family will tour the most picturesque parts of the continent.

Miss Mary and Miss Katherine Walsh are at the Hotel Victoria prior to their departure for Europe.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry Van Dyck Johns will soon leave for Baltimore on a visit to Mrs. Bland, sister of Mrs. Johns. They will be away six months.

Mrs. Ernest Johnstone, wife of Captain Johnstone, is in the Yosemite this year with her husband, and she is living with him at the military camp where they had Mrs. Charles Shiels as their guest for a fortnight. The accommodations rigged up by Captain Johnstone are positively luxurious.

The handsome home of the J. G. Kittles in Ross Valley will be thrown open to the public on Saturday, September 26th, when a bazaar for the benefit of the new organ for St. John's Church, Ross Valley, will take place.

One of the very pleasant dinner parties arranged during the past week at the Fairmont was given by Thornwell Mullaly to Mr. and Mrs. C. Frederick Kohl of Burlingame and Miss Virginia Jolliffe.

The Wellington Greggs and their daughters, Enid and Ethel, will arrive from abroad in the early part of November.

The Revelations of a Telephone Girl

"Well, yes, sometimes. Of course we ain't supposed to, but it's right absolutely in your ears and sometimes when there ain't a rush we do listen a bit. Oh, yes, it's mighty funny sometimes—say, but no one'd ever believe the way folks does do over a 'phone!

"There was last Friday—I never was so done up in all my life—there was a party and I bet he paid twenty-five dollars if he paid a cent—just to listen to some one talk. They certainly did beat all, them two. I was dead tired, but I never unhooked while they was at it—not after I began to catch on. She was in New York an' he was here, an' it was about ten when he rang up. It took about half an hour to get her an' then I heard him say:

"'Well, home again? An' then I was called off, an' when I was free they was still an' I thought they was done. I started to disconnect an—gee, but you ought to have heard him! He made me so mad I made up my mind I'd listen, an' I did, an' I heard her laugh an' say, 'You swore.' An' then he laughed, an' then he said in quite another key, 'Well, can I come?' And then there was silence. I bet that woman thought for more'n a dollar, an' then he asked if he could come again. She said at last, 'You are coming anyway, aren't you?' An' he said, 'Not unless you ask me to.' Then she was still again and I guess it was two dollars afore he said: 'Won't you ask me to come?' An' then him and me waited for all of two dollars an' a half. Finally he said, 'You think it over an' I'll call up about midnight.' An' she gasped—yes, she did, it came 'swish' right over the wire—an' then she said, 'Very well,' an' he broke the connection an' I charged him up with twelve dollars for the slimmest talk I ever overheard.

"Well, at midnight he rung up again, an' we got her pretty prompt an' he asked if she'd ask him to come again. She said, 'I'm thinking,' an' then he held the line an' kept still while she thought every penny of one-seventy-five. Then he said, 'Come, come, say that I may. I'll take the express at two. I can just make it.' Then come another gasp an' then a two-dollar-and-a-half wait.

"Well, honest, it got on my nerves. I was just wild to know how it would come out. Finally he said, 'You'd better ask me to come,' an' she said, 'Why don't you come anyway?' An' he said, 'No, I won't come 'nless you ask me to.' Then she thought three dollars' worth and then she said, 'I feel faint,' an' hung up.

"My goodness, you'd ought to a heard the way he give it to me to get that hotel and her room again. I could get the hotel, but I couldn't get her—an' I tried hard enough, too, but they said she didn't answer. He tried again about twenty minutes later, but she didn't answer.

"Well, the next day about noon somebody else in town set out to get her. It was a long job on account of being day, an' noon, too. It was all o' two o'clock when we got the number, an' then—well, give you my word, I was near to feelin' dizzy myself——

"For, if you'll believe me, it wasn't her as answered the 'phone—it was him.

"I guess he thought that it'd be cheaper in the long run if he didn't waito till she got around to asking him an' so he just took the night express.

"Looked so, anyhow, don't you think?" DELIA.

"The Time, The Place and The Girl" at the Van Ness

A whirlwind musical comedy, so called from the fact that its action is incessant, its dances a combination of snap, ginger and grace, which have never been approached before, and with groups of pretty, vivacious girls and a splendid cast of principals, comes to the Van Ness Theatre on Monday night for an engagement of two weeks. "The Time, The Place and The Girl" is the title of this attraction. It has made a record-breaking Chicago run and has scored triumph after triumph on its tour across the continent. John E. Young, a comedian of excellent attainments, heads the long list of musical comedy people. Besides Young the people included are Mable McIvine, Elizabeth Goodall, Lillian Goldsmith, E. C. Albertson, Theodore Rock, Ogden Wight and J. S. Simpson. There are twelve songs in the play, and its plot is unique and interesting. It runs in a more humorous vein than "The Girl Question," which is now on at the Van Ness, with a talented lot of interesting mummers in the cast.

Increased Demand for "The Music Master"

The Alcazar management announces a fourth and last week of David Warfield in "The Music Master," beginning Monday, September 28th. The following week the eminent character actor's latest dramatic triumph, "A Grand Army Man" will be given a week's run, concluding the most remarkable theatrical event in San Francisco's history. It is no exaggeration to declare that "The Music Master" could fill the Alcazar with people nightly for as many months as its engagement is measured by weeks, for instead of losing attractiveness its magnetism has grown with each performance. Folk who have witnessed it are its best advertisers. They advise all their friends to see it, and few of them fail to procure a second sitting. Not only in San Francisco and the trans-bay towns are its praises sung, but throughout California. David Belasco and David Warfield unite in pronouncing "A Grand Army Man" no less of a dramatic treat in a different way than "The Music Master" has proved itself to be, and the public eagerness to see Mr. Warfield in his newest vehicle is most intense, as is evidenced by the inquiries at the Alcazar box office. Another extra "Music Master" matinee is announced for next Thursday.

Rice and Cady at the American

For the coming week, commencing with Sunday night, September 27th, the American Theatre will offer the musical event of the season as the introductory show of the fall and winter season of eastern attractions in "Hip, Hip, Hooray." The book is by Edgar Smith, while the tuneful music is by Gus Edwards. This is Joe Weber's most successful musical comedy and served to pack the Weber Music Hall for more than a year. Rice and Cady, the German dialecticians who made such a hit here two years ago, have the title role in this girlie-musical play. They are surrounded by a most capable company of players, among whom are Mae Phelps, prima-donna, formerly with the "Gingerbread Man"; Wm. H. (Bill) Mack, character comedian; Tom Murray, baritone; Mazie Trumbull, the dancer; Harry Shunk, the minstrel man of the Field show; Maude Leroy, of the Weber forces; Rose Leslie and a handsome chorus. The catchiest of the popular song hits are "Coon College," "Ivy Green," "How Would You Like to Take Me Home With You," "Dear Old College Days," "Awfully Strong For You," "Goodbye, Mr. Ragtime," the latter two being by George M. Cohan; "Gee, I Wish I Had a Girl," and many others. The story deals with the trip of two wealthy Germans—Rice and Cady—to Doolittle College to see their sons on the day of the great boat race. It happens that a comic opera troupe is in town at the same time and the Germans become involved with the merry widows and there are many laughable incidents. "Hip, Hip, Hooray" will be the attraction for one week only. The new scale of popular prices will prevail. The attraction following the musical skit will be the powerful western drama, "Texas," which has had such a successful run in New York and other eastern cities. Most of the original cast well be seen in the American Theatre production.

"The Highwayman" at the Princess

Harry B. Smith and Reginald De Koven's musical romance, "The Highwayman," will be the attraction at the Princess Theatre Monday night, and all next week. It is pleasantly remembered as one of the greatest successes in the history of the Tivoli and its revival should prove very welcome, especially as it will be given a magnificent production and a splendid cast. Ferris Hartman will appear as the conceited and stupid "Foxy Quiller" of the Bow Street police station. It is one of his most humorous and enjoyable efforts. Arthur Cunningham as Dick Fitzgerald, an Irish soldier of fortune, who has been ruined by a gambler, John Hawkhurst, and becomes an outlaw under the title of Captain Scarlet, will repeat what in the opinion of many is the greatest success of his particularly brilliant career. Sybil Page will have a charming and congenial role as Lady Constance Sinclair, a court belle, and Zoe Barnett will be afforded delightful soubrette opportunity as Doll Primrose. As Lady Pamela Christina Nielsen is most happily cast. The other roles are alloted as follows: Sir Geoffrey Beverly, a sporting baronet, Walter Catlett; Captain Rodney, Melvin Stoltz; Tony Twinkle, Walter De Leon; Lord Kilkenny, Fred Kavanagh; Lieutenant Lovelace, Sarah Edwards; Sir John Hawkhurst, Karl Formes, Jr. The action of "The Highwayman" takes place in England in the eighteenth century. Dick Fitzgerald, an Irish free lance, is cheated out of his estate by a gambler named Hawkhurst and becomes a highwayman under the title of Captain Scarlet. Lady Constance Sinclair, who loves him, disguises as Scarlet and holds up a stage coach in order to obtain Dick's pardon, which has fallen into the hands of Hawkhurst. Lieutenant Rodney and Toby, ostler of the Cat and Fiddle, also personate Scarlet with a view of furthering their love affairs. A stupid detective, Foxy Quiller, manages to arrest the wrong people and to amusingly complicate affairs. In the end things are happily adjusted. The music is bright, tuneful and sparkling and in every way worthy of the composer of "Robin Hood."

Will Produce "The Devil" Here

Belasco & Mayer, owners and managers of the Alcazar, have rented the Novelty Theatre, at O'Farrell and Steiner streets, for a limited season, and will open it next Sunday afternoon, September 27th, with an elaborate production of "The Devil," New York's reigning dramatic sensation. So much has been written about the play that the reading public is eager to witness it, and Belasco & Mayer announce that they will give it a presentation as perfect as money and energy can accomplish. The cast has been carefully selected and no expense has been spared in the staging. Howard Hickman will play the title part, Louise Brownell the wife who is tempted, Bert Wesner her husband, Ernest Glendenning her artist lover, and the remainder of the characters will be faithfully portrayed. Fred J. Butler will personally direct the production. The story of the play is so peculiar and intricate that it is almost impossible to recount it in a limited space, but an idea of its novelty may be gleaned from the statement that His Satanic Majesty appears in ordinary modern garb and plays with two human souls. To those who search for understanding he is the personification of thoughts and temptations, and the more closely one watches what the author, Franz Molnar, is evidently attempting to do the more fascinating and thrilling it all becomes.

All-Star Bill at the Orpheum

The bill at the Orpheum for the week, beginning this Sunday matinee may be looked forward to with pleasure, for it will prove to be of a magnitude and variety that is only possible at rare intervals. It may be summed up as a combination of headliners, for there is not a single act that would not grace the best vaudeville entertainment as its worst feature. Jane Courthope, who has won golden opinions in the East as an actress of extraordinary talent, will present "Lucky Jim," a dramatic sketch in two scenes by Frank R. Ferbuson. The playlet tells a thrilling and interesting story of mining life in the lonely Sierra Nevada mountains, with a man, a woman and a boy for its chief figures. Miss Courthope will be admirably supported by that clever actor, Charles Forrester, and by Master Ross, an exceptionally clever boy. Hillarion and Rosalia Ceballos and their Phantastic Phantoms created a furore when presented by Ned Wayburn for the summer show at Hammerstein's Roof Garden in New York. The Ceballos, Hillarion and Rosalia, are two extraordinary clever acrobats who were features in Klaw and Erlanger's big spectacle, "Humpty Dumpty." Rosalia was the dainty Columbine and Hillarion the Devil. The Phantoms are all in white costumes with a background entirely of black which causes them to form a striking contrast and affords opportunities for weird and amusing effects. Miss Vinie Daly, the youngest of the illustrious Daly family, will present a series of numbers carefully selected from musical comedies in which she has triumphed and created original roles. Last year she was a feature with George M. Cohan's "George Washington, Jr."; previous to that she was successfully associated with Eddie Foy in "Piff Paff Pouf" and Sam Bernard in "The Rollicking Girl." She is a clever and versatile actress who sings and dances delightfully. The Swor Brothers, comedians and dancers, who have long been classed among the leading minstrel lights, will amuse with impersonations of two distinct types of Southern negro characters. Next week will be the last of those acrobatic wonders, the Seven Yuilians; of Claude and Fannie Usher who have made the greatest hit in "Fagan's Decision" of any slang sketch we have had since "Peaches." The Reiff Brothers, and that fascinating musical novelty, the Pianophiends will also close their engagement. An interesting and novel series of Orpheum motion pictures will terminate the performance.

The Lloyd Scott "Travel Talks"

Next Monday morning the course sale for the Lloyd Scott "Travel Talks" will open at Sherman Clay & Co's Van Ness avenue store, near California. There will be a two courses of five subjects each, the subjects of each course being identical. This will enable subscribers to attend three times in one week and only twice in another to hear Mr. Scott on all of the five interesting trips. On Thursday, October 1, the sale for single events will open and for the convenience of business men and others Manager Greenbaum will establish a branch box office at the Sherman, Clay store at Kearney and Sutter streets. One has no idea how fascinating these "Travel Talks" are until one has heard one of them. The constant changing of the pictures accompanied by interesting narratives and anecdotes keeps one's mind constantly riveted on the subject. As an Eastern critic expressed it, "it is taking a foreign journey in an easy chair." The subjects will be "Egypt," "India," "Ireland," "Japan" and "Russia." Over one hundred hand-colored slides will be exhibited on each country, besides thousands of feet of motion pictures and many sliding panoramas. Special matinees will be given for school children on Saturdays. The announcements for these will appear next issue. At the conclusion of the engagement in this city a course will be given at Maple Hall, Oakland. The opening night here will be Monday, October 5, at Christian Science Hall.

Features of the La Vigne Concert

The concert to be given by Mons. 'Noe Joseph La Vigne, the distinguished dramatic baritone, at Lyric Hall next Thursday evening, October 1, is exciting widespread interest in the musical community. He will be assisted by Miss Betty Scholtz, a talented young violinist, and Miss Alma Rudolph and Mrs. F. B. Kirwin, who will act as accompanists. Mons. La Vigne will sing the prologue to "I Pagliacci," "La Donna e Mobile," from Rigoletto, Schubert's Erl-King, Mattei's "'Tis Not True," Roeckel's "Coming of the King," Tosti's "Good-Bye" and several other equally interesting selections. A feature of his work will be that he will give all his numbers in their original languages and he promises several delightful surprises in the way of encores. Miss Scholtz, who is a graduate of the Berlin Conservatory of Music, will play De Beriot's Seventh Concerto, op. 76; Schumann's Traumerei, Eichorn's First Hungarian Dance, Vieuxtemp's Fantasie from Lombardi, and the Legende of Wieniawski.

New Concerts at Greek Theatre

Official announcement is made of another series of concerts to be given in the Greek Theatre, beginning Saturday evening, September 26th, and continuing every Saturday night thereafter until October 17th. The concerts will be orchestral and under the leadership of Paul Steindorff. The selection of Steindorff to lead the concerts would seem to indicate that the movement for the restoration of symphony work that has been agitating Berkeley for some time is given added impetus. The versatility of Steindorff's talent will be shown in the concerts. He has been engaged by the Musical and Dramatic Committee, headed by Prof. William Armes, to conduct three of the series of four concerts. The third concert will be rendered by the Pasmore Sisters, assisted by an orchestra of thirty-five pieces. The concerts will be given at popular prices. The program for the first concert is as follows: March, "Mofi Stofle," Holst; overture, "Tampa," Harold; Barcarolle, "Love Tales of Hoffman," Offenbach; grand American Phantasia, Victor Herbert; selection, "Prince of Pilsen," Lucers; vocal solo, introduction third act of Lohengrin, Wagner; ballet music, "Feramors," Rubinstein; scenes from La Boheme, Puccini;

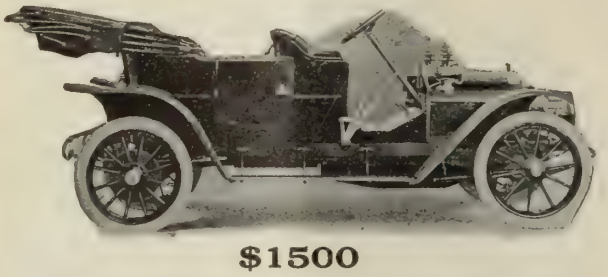
J. S. Brereton of Vallejo, who has just purchased a Thomas Flyer, took his first spin last Monday to St. Helena. Notwithstanding the lateness of the year the Napa County roads are quite free from dust and make fine motoring.

Dr. and Mrs. Dudley Fulton of Los Angeles are in this city, having just made the trip from there in their new Oldsmobile roadster. The doctor stated that he felt perfectly safe in coming without a chauffeur, although he claims he knows nothing about a car. His only trouble was the breaking of a spark plug. There was not even a punctured tire to interfere with the pleasure of the party. Speaking of the trip, the doctor said: "I had lots of fun with some big cars that were coming in the same direction. Sometimes they were ahead and sometimes I was. The roads this side of Santa Barbara are vile, but from Soledad to Salinas and from San Jose to this city they are very good. Between Salinas and San Juan the dust is so deep that straw has been put down with an idea of making the going easier, but I would as soon plow through sand as through straw."



The Buick "White Streak" is rapidly acquiring a reputation as a racing car, and has recently scored a number of victories on eastern tracks, among them being a race meet at Kalamazoo, Michigan, in which the little runabout captured six out of the seven events in which it was entered. Other notable victories were at Elkhart, Indiana, Portage La Prairie, Winnipeg, and Aurora, Nebraska.

A motor car bus service, using White steam touring cars, has recently been installed between San Juan and Ponce, Porto Rico. A car leaves each end of the line each morning and makes the trip in about six hours. The new service has attained popularity, and bookings must be made at least ten days in advance in order to obtain accommodations. Since the United States took over control of the island considerable road improvement work has been done, and the highway between San Juan on the north coast and Ponce on the south coast is now said to be in fair condition. The new bus service is particularly popular with tourists visiting Porto Rico, as it gives them an opportunity to see the interior of the island which is not accessible by railroad.

The Chalmers-Detroit forty "Blue-Bird," the famous car which won the 320-mile Rocky Mountain cup race this year in the remarkable time of 8:25:39, has been doing some touring stunts in Southern California. The car has just returned to Los Angeles after a 600-mile trip through the Mojave Desert. The objective point of the trip was the Owens River, from which the new equeduct is being built to supply Los Angeles with water. The trip was made through heavy sand, and in some places through very rough country. Very few automobiles have made this trip, and it is considered quite a proof of endurance for a car to come through it successfully.

Mr. W. H. Hansen of Redwood City has purchased a Stevens-Duryea Limousine.

The remarkable record made by the White steamer in the Mt. Baldy road race at Los Angeles Sunday was the chief topic of conversation among auto racing enthusiasts yesterday. The time of Captain Ryus' White for the one hundred miles was 3:35:30 as against the old record of 4:18:00. The competing car made better time than the old record, but it was beaten 38 minutes by the White steamer. It is said that Captain Ryus drove the most remarkable race of his career.

J. L. Smiley, a prominent motorist of Oakland, has just completed a tour in his Thomas touring car. For the benefit of prospective tourists, Smiley has given the following description of the roads over which he toured: Tahoe City to Truckee, fourteen miles, level, good; Truckee and Sierraville, good, rolling; Sierraville to Quincy, dusty, desert, good; Quincy to Oroville, stiff, hilly, rough, fair; Oroville to Marysville, fair.

Mr. and Mrs. E. D. Mendenhall were the hosts for an Oldsmobile trip to San Jose last Sunday. The guests were Miss Elizabeth Mendenhall, Miss Eveline Parsons, Mr. Humphry and Edward Bullis.

Mr. H. P. Frear, naval designer at the Union Iron Works, returned this week from a five-days' jaunt to the high Sierras in his two-cylinder Buick touring car. He was accompanied by his family and drove to Tahoe and as far east as Reno, Nevada. He covered a distance of 550 miles during a five days' absence from his home at Burlingame.

The performance of a forty horse-power Buick touring car in the Lowell, Mass., road race, over a distance of 254.4 miles, on September 7th, proved a veritable surprise. The Buick was the smallest car of the seven starters, the remaining entries ranging from 50 to 65 h. p. The race was run over a course, the laps of which were 10.6 miles. Burman, the driver of the Buick, made the fastest lap of the race in the ninth circuit of the course, when his speed averaged 54.8 miles per hour. He finished second, being beaten only by the 65 h. p. Isotta driven by Strang.

Ed. Christensen, a local lumber importer, started with a party of friends on Friday in his 40 h. p. Buick touring car for a tour to the Pacific Northwest, which will occupy several weeks. The objective point of his trip is Seattle. A visit to Spokane is planned before the return trip is undertaken.

J. C. Pedersen, a business man of Santa Rosa, has returned to his home after a pleasant visit with his family at Bartlett Springs. The entire journey from Santa Rosa to Bartlett Springs was accomplished without trouble in Mr. Pedersen's 30 h. p. Buick touring car.

ing closer, very softly, she saw that the fishing pole was lying on the grass, and Hans had a board on his knees which he used when making designs for the machinery. He was drawing and seemed to absorbed in his work. Then Violette risked one step, then two. A twig broke, but he did not move, for he heard nothing. Then when she was near enough, with one bound she leapt upon him, threw her arms about her lover's neck and covered his face with kisses. He pushed her back with a fearful German oath. Even when he recognized her his anger was not altogether appeased. Indignantly she drew back.

"What is it so magnificent that you are drawing that you do not want me to look at the picture?"

"Nothing." He picked up the drawing-board upon which there was fastened a sheet of white paper. He tried to hide it but he was not so quick but what Violette saw that it was a map of the valley and an exact plan of the fort. Red lines had been drawn from various parts of the fort to the highest tops at the neighboring hills. Like a flash she understood.

"Spy! You a syp! You!"

He turned deadly pale and staggered to his feet. The perspiration ran down his forehead. The expression of scorn in the girl's voice struck him like a whip lash. Suddenly he stopped, took the drawing from the board and tore it into bits. Then he turned to her and said:

"No, Violette—I swear to you—that I am not that—I am not that. Listen—listen——"

But she was suffocating. She withdrew quickly the hand he tried to take.

"Listen! I did not want to do that—But—How can I explain it to you?"

And then in a confused way he tried to tell her in his mixed language of French and German that he had come there for the purpose of drawing a piece of machinery. But the beauty of the landscape had tempted him; then he had made the plan. He remembered the fears of the foreman in regard to possible complications between the two countries and instinctively he had made some calculations and plans, for he was an artilleryman in a Prussian regiment. The red lines marked the directions in which shell could be sent into the fort most effectively. He was embarrassed, and dared not look her in the face.

"Spy! Spy! You, a Socialist!" murmured Violette. "Spy, you, a workingman!"

He defended himself with the persistency of despair. He pleaded passionately, the tears running down his cheeks.

"It wasn't I who did it. It was another. A man who is my master and whom I must obey. There was another thought probably, the memory of my father who died at the battle of Gravelotte while attacking your people, for I belong, after all, to that warlike race of Germans who in olden times destroyed the legions of the Latins. Whatever my heart may desire, whatever may be the wish of my whole soul, I am a slave to the past, I am the slave of my ancestors. It is they who, by my hand, betrayed your hospitality, my own poor love, for I could not resist the temptation of betraying your confidence—no, I could not do it."

She turned to a tree and placing her arms against it hid her face, that he might not see her suffering. When she looked up Hans had gone.

Violette went back to her uncle's house, mute, stunned, terrified. The following day the German workmen left the factory under pretext of a strike. And as they went up the hill toward the east no songs cheered their departure. The girls at the looms were very quiet.

They had no hope now but in the marvelous land they could see through the large windows, and the forest of green and gold, in the valley that was like an emerald.

A Starting New Bath

The very latest thing in Paris is the lemonade bath. It is supposed to be cooling, refreshing and beneficial. A pretty Parisian actress has instituted the fashion of letting her friends see her take her lemonade plunge. In a charming Directoire bathing dress, with her hair tied up in yellow ribbons, she sat and received her guests in a white tub draped with yellow and filled with lemonade, with pieces of lemon peel floating about on the surface. A glass of iced lemonade was given to each guest, and for those who would join in the novelty lemonade baths were arranged and Directoire bathing dresses provided. It is scarcely likely that this form of the bath will ever become really popular, but as an advertising scheme for a young actress it is certainly far better than lost jewels, and the actress who conceived the idea is much talked of as the inventor of an original scheme of entertainment.

Letters

New Novel by Maurice Hewlett

In "Halfway House" Maurice Hewlett has taken a new departure and given us a novel of contemporaneous English life. It is likewise the chronicle of a May and December marriage and the almost inevitable disillusionment of the parties most concerned, though had the discrepancies of years and station been less. one could hardly expect a happier conclusion from such a hasty wooing. John Germain was fifty-five, a landed gentleman and a scholar. Moreover, he was a widower whose first marriage had been anything but an ideal one and whose wife had led him through thorny paths before she finally broke her neck on the hunting field. His second choice fell upon a nursery governess, middle class and poor, whom he saw and idealized at a school fete in his brother's parish. Mary Middleham was twenty-four, quiet and eternally feminine. From almost her infancy she had had her "affairs," and even at the time when the elderly John Germain put his heart into her keeping, she was juggling with three or four swains. The breathlessness with which an English wooing proceeds is almost a matter of amazement. Within a week from the moment when the elderly aspirant first beheld Miss Middleham he had proposed and been accepted. Possibly the outcome might have been better in this case had John Germain had fewer relatives. As it is, there is a sister-in-law to reckon with, and she distinctly did not like Mary Middleham. She made no attempt to disguise her feelings, and it was owing to her deft and seemingly unintentional interference that matters shaped themselves so badly. The villain in the piece was Tristram Duplessis, one of those insufferable characters to whom women seem to gravitate as moths to a candle flame. Duplessis was a cousin of Mrs. James Germain and naturally, in her eyes, a superior personage. With Mary Middleham he played, after the manner of his kind, and Mary was nothing loth. That he should have thought seriously of her was not to be dreamed, but Mary was in her way, flattered and fascinated by his attentions. The relations between Mary and her elderly husband assumed immediately rather those of father and daughter or guardain and ward than those of husband and wife. A little more openness in the beginning, from both, might have set matters right, but John Germain's first matrimonial experience had not been such as to inspire him with confidence, and Mary, like most of her sex, was given to evasions and half-confidences. In due course of time Duplessis again appeared on the scene, and Mrs. Germain being now in his own class, proceeded to resume his flirtation where it had been interrupted. John Germain, having long schooled himself to concealment and repression, was assumed to be blind to what was going on. He providentially died in time to prevent an open scandal, but the provisions of his will showed that he had had from the first his apprehensions. Meanwhile there is in the background another person yet to be reckoned with. John Senhouse is decidedly an original conception, for while he repudiates most of the traditions and accepted usages and prefers to travel about the country with a horse and cart, painting a little, writing an occasional article for the periodicals, tinkering and doing odd jobs at primitive handicraft, he is yet neither socialist nor anarchist. His hobby is the propagation of plants, and his design is to turn every wild spot into a garden. He appears to be a sort of natural father confessor to whom all turn with their consciences and confidences, and shallow, flirtatious Mary Middleham among the rest. Senhouse must needs fall in love with her on sight too. He is the "halfway house" offered her as a choice between going forward with the elderly husband John Germain or turning back to the toying with Duplessis. Fortunately Germain died in the nick of time to simplify the choice, for one cannot feel any great confidence in the settled resolution of a woman of her make. Neither can one expect her to be long contented with Senhouse, even with the delightful prospect of five years of plant hunting and propagating in the Caucasus and the Black Forest. Perhaps Mr. Hewlett too expects nothing more than that it will prove for her but a halfway halt on her way toward the next adventure. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons.

Ohio Village Folks

"Folks Back Home" is a companion volume to "Back Home," and is devoted to the description of odd characters and incidents in a central Ohio village of other days. While there are some who affect to see in Eugene Wood's sketches only criticism and ill-natured jibes, the majority of readers who are less thin skinned and more genial, will enjoy "The Makin's of Abel Horn," and "M'ree Hutchins' Husband." If there is anything funnier than Mrs. Biddle's disciplining of her Augustus it has not yet been found in print, and there are love stories galore, grave and gay, besides some heart-breaking tragedies. Some few of the sketches have appeared in the magazines, but the majority are new in the present form. For those who can enjoy and appreciate it, "Folks Back Home" will prove interesting whether as a novelty or as awakening reminiscences of their own experiences. For those who are disposed to find fault with every word not laudatory of the good old times, one can but say they will be losing a pleasure they might have participated in by not reading it in the proper spirit. It is one of the books to be kept in mind when making lists of good things to be given away. Published by the McClure Company.

Gertrude Atherton's Latest

Gertrude Atherton has kilted up her skirts and hied her to London, where she is making arrangements for the publication of her latest novel, just completed in Munich. Mrs. Atherton is again flirting with the wraith of Alexander Hamilton, whom she all but deified in her "Conqueror." About three years ago Mrs. Atherton was quoted by a newspaper correspondent as designing a companion work which should deal just as intimately with Aaron Burr, against whom she denied having any prejudice whatever. To her he and Hamilton alike were but literary material ready to her hand. There are a good many readers who have been awaiting that volume with more interest than they usually display and wondering whether the scheme has been abandoned or only deferred. It is certain, however, that if ever the Burr book materializes, its predecessor, "The Conqueror," will enjoy a new boom.

Scott's Narrow Escape

The coming celebration of the birthday of Sir Walter Scott makes it a befitting time to remind the world of the narrow escape it had from never having known him at all. When the future great novelist was a tiny infant he was left in charge of a maid at Sandy Knowe, but the girl had a lover in Edinburgh, and she was anxious to join him there, and she regarded her charge as an obstacle to be removed. She afterward confessed that she carried Baby Scott up to the Craigs, under a strong temptation of the devil, as she expressed it, intending to cut his throat with her scissors and bury him under the moss.

"Vera, the Medium"

It is reported that the inability of the literary critic to understand and appreciate the character of "Captain Macklin" is the reason why Richard Harding Davis has forsaken his old-time heroes and given his attention to play-writing, with the ever-present necessity for providing a happy ending. It is six years since "Captain Macklin" appeared, and now we have "Vera, the Medium." "Vera" is only a longish short story, the whole action being crowded into one day. It introduces us to an atmosphere into which we have already penetrated at greater length, led by Gellett Burgess in "The Heart Line," and it is worthy of remark that while these two authors have been exposing the shady ways of the spook manipulators, their brother novelist, Hamlin Garland, is working just as industriously and earnestly for the other side. It is a sordid drama, this in which Vera holds the center of the stage, a senile old millionaire on his death bed, surrounded by harpies intent on grasping his wealth ere the dead hand relaxes its grip. The basis of Stephen Halliwell's fortune was a patent owned by his brother-in-law, but placed on the market through his capital. No sooner was the inventor dead than the living Halliwell proceeded to defraud the widow and daughter of their rights, and now in turn he is himself the victim of a gang of conspirators, headed by his trusted friend and legal advisor. The object of the conspiracy is to persuade Halliwell to sign a will he has had drawn in which he leaves his fortune to an institute which is to perpetuate his name, the trustees of course to be the conspirators who will feather their nests abundantly. Meanwhile there is a niece who threatens suit for an accounting of her father's estate, and who is likely to contest any such disposition. Halliwell is most anxious to "make his peace," and being virtually convinced of the reality of spiritual communications, insists on a seance being held in his rooms and a materialization of his dead sister, whom he must see and question. It is Vera, who, with the assistance of the guardian-partner Vance, is to carry out the deception. Vera, we are to believe, is not only transcendently beautiful, but honest and admirable in every other respect. She comes from a family which, for generations, has dealt in spookery and to her it is only a method of making a living. She sees nothing objectionable about it and probably never would were it not for an exceedingly youthful and impetuous District Attorney who becomes unofficially mixed up in the case. As it is her slumbering conscience is awakened and the conspirators are foiled. There is a whirlwind wooing, but it is against all human probability that Vera and Winthrop will pass a conventionally happy future. Though Helen Coates, the niece, is undoubtedly being victimized, nevertheless she does not gain the sympathy of readers who involuntarily contrast her with Vera, greatly to her disadvantage. Even the slatternly, showy Mabel, credulous wife of the fakir Vance, is more to our liking. In truth, if Mr. Davis meant to heap contumely on the traffickers with the other world he has left them in hardly worse case than the learned professions of law and medicine. "Vera the Medium" is a good story, taking its limits into consideration it is a very good one, but it is not so good as Richard Harding Davis has given us the right to expect from his practiced pen. MICHAEL FARRARA,
Plaintiff,
vs.
LUCIE FARRARA,
Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA, send greeting to LUCIE FARRARA, Defendant.

YOU ARE HEREBY REQUIRED to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, on the ground of defendant's extreme cruelty, also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

GIVEN under my hand and the Seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 29th day of July, A. D. 1908.

Fifty Years of Steinway Leadership

Steinway Miniature Grand

The Steinway was created to be a medium to express the very soul of music, and Steinway genius made it a masterpiece, defying imitation.

It has maintained its pre-eminence because the inventions of each successive generation of the Steinway family have kept it far in advance of all other pianos—have seemingly exhausted mechanical possibilities and attained a perfect instrument.

Steinway Verte-Grand

The wonderful refinement of its tone beauty has never been equaled. The proven durability of Steinway workmanship has never been rivalled. Infinite pains and the highest skill have placed it beyond comparison.

Yet, Steinway reputation has never been exploited for commercial ends. Steinway always means BEST—one grade only. Every Steinway piano is an ORIGINAL, not a COPY made by alien hands.

What the Steinway has been to other musicians—a prized work of art—an object of affection like a real Stradivarius violin, to be handed down from one generation to another—THAT the Steinway would be to you.

It's price is low for a masterpiece, and differs little from that of so-called "just as good" pianos. Ultimately you will want a Steinway anyhow.

Without Benefit of Clergy

Politics makes cowards of them all. If Mr. Hearst had preferred his charges against the leaders of the Republican and Democratic parties at any other time than this, they would have been "treated with the contempt they deserve." The most that would have been answered to Mr. Hearst would have involved a demand for his proofs; and whether these proofs were thereafter forthcoming or not, the incident would have been definitely "closed" as far as the accused might be concerned. It is possible that in the case of Senator Foraker a "verdict" of guilty would have been rendered by the Mighty One in the White House, for that prejudice knows no brother; but if Mr. Taft were not a candidate for the Presidency it is very likely that he would go on his smiling, genial way, hoping for Foraker support in any future ambition that might arise, personally content to let bygones be bygones and disallowing for himself any interest in the quarrel between the Czar of Ohio and the Emperor of all the Americas, pro tem. If Governor Haskell had been accused by Mr. Hearst at any other time than this of treason to the State by reason of his criminal connection with the Standard Oil corporation, Mr. Bryan would have refused to throw his friend to the lions. Those who are being butchered to make a Hearst holiday are the victims of circumstance. Their kismet is in the conjunction of the political stars of the republic. It has been discovered in the casting of the horoscope that Saturn was in the ascendant in the house of Calamity at their birth. It was a cowardly necessity. The confidence of the Taft managers that was so buoyant in the morning collapsed and withered at eventide; the hope that sprang so high in the human breasts of the Bryan councillors when jocund day stood tiptoe on the mountain top came down with a dull, sickening thud when the gray gloaming, like a hooded nun, stole into the thickening shadows of night. Politicians, like children are afraid of the dark; and like the superstitious aborigines they fear the unknown and the unknowable. These politicians didn't know what else Hearst had up his sleeve, and they resolved to take no chances. And when the Olympian who abides temporarily in the White House loosed the thunder of his Jovian wrath they were more scared than ever. It was indeed time to lighten ship. Overboard with this cumbrous flotsam; into the mighty deep with this horrible jetsam. The gods are angry and destruction awaits those upon whom the divine wrath shall descend. There is but one Roosevelt and Hearst is his Prophet. Bismillah! Allah abkar; la ilah illa ilah! There is panic terror in both camps and the cry is "Save himself who can!"

Their Heads are Safe

Fortunately the bearers of the party sanjaks are safe from the anathemas of President Roosevelt and Mr. Hearst. Neither Mr. Taft nor Mr. Bryan could afford to obey the behest of the Marat or the thunderous command of Danton. It is a reign of terror, to be sure; but there are two heads that may not be meat for the bloody maw of the guillotine. The tumbrils may bear their loads to the place where the journalists sit knitting in the sun; there will be no Bryan in the bunch, no Taft to smile forgiveness upon the mocking mob. Against these leaders the shafts of Hearst hurtle harmless and the brotherless spear of Roosevelt finds no lodgment. But all others must walk the plank. Be they pure as snow and chaste as ice, they shall not escape Hearst; be they as far above reproach and suspicion as Caesar would have had his wife, they shall not get out of sight of Roosevelt's all-seeing eye.

As Seen in a White Light

The most that we can say conscientiously to the credit of Mr. Hearst is that he he has done more than stimulate interest in the sordid squabble over political honors and emoluments. He has induced certain eminent citizens to expose themselves in a white light to the populace, and their nakedness is instructive if not edifying. We now see that so far as personal character is concerned there is not a great difference between the two leading candidates for the highest office in the gift of the people. The consciousness of this fact ought to be and doubtless is mortifying to our conceit. It is humiliating to realize that the next President of the United States is bound to be either a humbug or a hypocrite or a compound of both, but apparently there is no solace available except in the hope that the responsibilities and dignity of the office will have a refining and ennobling influence on the occupant. This is not a vain hope, though it may seem so in view of current experience. But Mr. Roosevelt is peculiar. In him there are vulgar traits which education has failed to polish. The old Adam in Teddy is a very ugly personage. Lodged in a bodily frame of surpassing vigor, roused by vehement appetites and sensitive to all the passions by which men are roused for offensive and defensive warfare against their fellows, he takes a childish delight in the perverted use of his power, and displays it as ostentatiously as one of the half-witted boys who were raised to the purple in the evil days of the Roman empire. Mr. Taft differs from Mr. Roosevelt in that his inclinations are generally fit and feasible to follow, but unfortunately in the stress and heat of this campaign he has been following the inclinations of his mentor, and the result is not gratifying to lovers of moral worth or to those who hate petty subterfuges and the mean artifices and deceptions of the practical politician.

Taft's Magnanimity

The Hon. William Taft, to whom we pledged our support in the early days of this campaign, has been considerably lowered in our esteem in consequence of the attitude which he and his managers assumed toward Senator Foraker immediately after and by reason of the disclosures made by Mr. Hearst. In our opinion it is impossible for any sophistry to counfound the modes of viewing Mr. Taft's conduct. That he sought to advantage himself at Mr. Foraker's expense by an artful and ostentatious display of magnanimity while secretly conniving at the calumniation of the victim of Mr. Hearst's partisan assault, can hardly be doubted. As Mr. Foraker had announced his willingness to stake his political future on the explanation that he would make of his relations with the Standard Oil Company, the decent thing for Mr. Taft and Mr. Roosevelt to do was to wait and listen candidly to what the accused had to say. Now what did Mr. Taft do? He gave expression to this sentiment for promulgation for campaign purposes: "If it would win me every vote in the United States I cannot hit Foraker when he is down." According to a New York critic what

Mr. Taft really meant to say was this: "If it would win me every vote in the United States I cannot hit Mr. Foraker by advertising him as down until I really know that he is down." If Mr. Taft prefers the amendment he is welcome to it, but in view of his acquiescence in Mr. Roosevelt's attack on Senator Foraker we think he will have some difficulty in vindicating his magnanimity. Mr. Roosevelt joyously assumed that Foraker was down and out. He was probably exalted to the seventh heaven of delight on witnessing the spectacle of his old enemy struggling beneath a load of calumny. In a moment of ecstasy he pointed the finger of scorn at Foraker and in one of those characteristic ebullitions of his wrath, through which are always to be seen the movements of his puerile vanity, he proceeded to scourge the Ohio statesman in the enthusiastic spirit of a flagellant taming his own rebellious flesh. Never was there an instance in which vanity or spleen was more short-sighted. For whatever may be thought of Senator Foraker's clear, concise and forceful statement in vindication of his own conduct, none but ardent, myopic partisans and bigoted plutophobes will fail to apprehend the rank impropriety of President Roosevelt's precipitous effort to revenge himself on the hero of the Brownsville controversy.

Terrible Teddy's Revenge

Mr. Taft, as it appears to us, while advertising the magnanimity of his nature as exemplified in his attitude of forbearance toward Senator Foraker, connived at an indecent assault on that gentleman. If we are mistaken in this view Mr. Roosevelt is to blame. Immediately after the arraignment of Senator Foraker on the strength of letters which came into Mr. Hearst's possession in a way which he does not care to discuss, the gentleman occupying the exalted position of President of the United States, with an illiberality of sentiment which disqualifies him from being just, seized upon the incident as a pretext for vociferously celebrating the virtues of his ward and heir. It is perhaps unnecessary, as well as aside from the purpose, to point to this obtrusion as evidence of the fact that Mr. Roosevelt lacks what Dryden tells us is the dividing line between wise men and fools. We assume that the readers of Town Talk are among the reasoning mortals scattered here and there, who, unaffected by the nimbus that enchants the general eye, are not disposed merely because Mr. Roosevelt is President, to square his aberrations with standards of right behaviour. In adjudging Mr. Foraker guilty without hearing him in his own defense the President of the United States was guilty of a shameful violation of one of the most sacred principles of our government, yet in so doing he was absolutely consistent with the line of conduct which he has pursued for four years and by which he has won the applause and approbation of his countrymen. But the impropriety of Mr. Roosevelt's conduct in thus backing up a cruel partisan assault on a statesman hitherto presumed to be of unimpeachable character is not what we wish to discuss at this time, but rather the complicity therein of a candidate for President. Assuming Mr. Foraker to be guilty of improper relations with the Standard Oil Company Mr. Roosevelt called attention to the fact that the Ohio Senator had persistently opposed the policies of the Administration. He further assumed that the letters read by Mr. Hearst proved that Senator Foraker's opposition was dishonest and he asserted that Mr. Taft's hostility to Foraker in Ohio politics was due to the suspicion of an unholy alliance between the Senator and the Standard Oil Company. Then to vindicate Mr. Taft's freedom from sinister influence and his loyalty to principle he published a letter purporting to have been written by his protege to some unknown individual on the eve of the Chicago convention. From this letter it appears that it was written in answer to a letter suggesting a compromise in Ohio politics between Taft and Foraker, whereby each should withdraw opposition to the other. Mr. Taft is represented as having rejected the proposition with scorn and with having affirmed his eternal loyalty to the principles of the tutelary deity of Oyster Bay. This whole transaction is as bereft of convincing details as a sensation contrived by Detective Burns to influence a jury. Furthermore it is as tawdry in its theatrical equipment as a Belasco melodrama. Even though it could be shown that Mr. Taft's correspondent had been authorized to make the rejected proposition we should be inclined to question the motive with which the correspondence was inspired, for we know that Mr. Taft, with all the machinery of the Administration behind him, was not seriously alarmed at the hostility of Mr. Foraker. Moreover, we are perfectly familiar with the time-worn trick (quite as antiquated as the shell and pea game) of employing a dummy correspondent as a medium of airing views for the edification of the public. It was bad enough for the President of the United States to employ such an expedient, but he made matters worse when, apparently unconscious of his own depravity, he told us that he published Mr. Taft's letter without Mr. Taft's permission. We know that Mr. Roosevelt is a man actuated by no principle or process of reasoning; that he is controlled by passion and pique; we know that he has done some pretty tough things in his time, but we must with all due deference decline to believe that as the custodian of Mr. Taft's private letters he would dare to publish any one of them without that gentleman's permission. If we were inclined to accept Mr. Roosevelt's word in this instance it would be reasonable to charge us with ranking him as a moral pervert along with the man who stole the Archbold-Foraker letters from the Standard Oil Company. We know that Mr. Roosevelt knowingly quoted a stolen letter in one of his messages to the Congress of the United States; and of course we know that he sentenced Senator Foraker to dishonor before the completion of the process of weighing against a definitely formulated accusation a full and deliberately prepared reply, but still we are of the opinion that in accusing himself of publishing Mr. Taft's letter without the latter's permission he spoke as a member of the Ananias club.

Foraker's Services

At the time President Roosevelt joined in the assault on Senator Foraker the Ohio statesman was entitled to a suspension of judgment until the last word of his defense had been uttered. He has spoken, but we doubt that he has been given an attentive hearing. In these days so far as those statesmen are concerned whose resistance of innovations on the principles of government has caused them to be designated the tools of the plutocracy, few persons are sifting facts with scrupulous integrity. Besides, a serene calmness of insight is incompatible with the intensity of feeling which prevails during a political campaign. By many Senator Foraker will be adjudged guilty on the ipse dixit of President Roosevelt. Only here and there are men who have kept in touch with controversies and contests at Washington and who know of the circumstances in which Senator Foraker wounded the pride and excited the hatred of the autocrat of the White Houes. The few that are familiar with Senator Foraker's record, that know of the luminous criticism and opposition which he has brought to bear on the hasty and absurd projects of law emanating from the White House; and especially those that know all the facts of the Brownsville controversy, and of the humiliation which Senator Foraker put upon the President by insisting on justice, even to black men—the few that are in possession of all this information will not be deceived by the imputations purporting to be inspired by a well-founded suspicion of dishonesty. If Senator Foraker has not performed his duties with conscientious independence he has at least been loyal to the Constitution and he has maintained the legal and traditional American respect for the rights of property. If he has not fallen down and worshiped the Brazen Calf of the White House, it is at least to his credit that he tried to avert many of the evils which President Roosevelt brought upon the country. Doutless it was by Standard Oil officials that his attention was called to some of the dangerous propositions advanced by Mr. Roosevelt, for those officials are naturally eager to prevent widespread industrial disturbances, but when Standard Oil officials avail themselves of the right of every citizen to enlist the services of a Senator in opposition to demagogic measures the assumption is not imperative that the deal is tinctured with corruption. And at all events the evidence against Senator Foraker is far less convincing than the documentary proofs of Mr. Roosevelt's invitation to the practical man Mr. Harriman to assist in the preparation of a message to Congress at a time when a large sum of money was needed for campaign purposes.

A Versatile Mayor

We had almost forgotten that Mayor Taylor is learned in the law. Most of us think of him as a poet and the translator of poets. We were recalled, however, with somewhat abrupt emphasis from our loftier contemplation of the first citizen of San Francisco, by announcements in the daily newspapers to the effect that Mayor Taylor has been looking up the law and the precedent in the matter of the right of the United Railroads to a franchise on lower Market street, and also that he has passed upon the validity of the city's stipulation with Secretary Garfield in regard to the water rights under Government control in the Hetch Hetchy valley. Our honorable and worthy Mayor is indeed a versatile citizen; what he knows he seems to know thoroughly; and what he does he does with neatness and dispatch. We have no fault to find with him as a municipal executive; we are willing to grant that his interpretation of the law from his viewpoint is better than could be expected from a mere layman; and we acknowledge without reservation that his poetry is more than average—which is saying much for his talent in an age when poets are so plentiful, so prolific and so mediocre. Personally we are at variance with Mayor Taylor in his opinion concerning the rights of the United Railroads and the status of the city's interest in Hetch Hetchy; but that difference need not worry the Mayor, for we are all liable to err in such matters; we are as human in this regard as Mayor Taylor; we may be wrong and we may be right, and only the Supreme Court can decide between us—a decision that may be reversed by the same court in the next similar case presented for their judgment. Nobody is infallible in the law except Judge Lawlor, and even Judge Lawlor has his limitations as he will himself admit if you mention the Appellate Court to him. Personally we would rather discuss Mayor Taylor's poetry than his opinions and decisions on legal matters, however much we may respect those opinions and decisions. We are more at home in poetry than we are in the law; we only know when a lawyer is wrong. We not only know when a poet is off his metre but we know when he is saddle-tight on Pegasus. We would rather discuss Mayor Taylor's poetry than traverse his opinion on a matter of legal import. Poetry is an exact science; the law is itself unto itself; poetry can be judged by well-defined canons and measured by laws from which there can be no appeal; the law is a libertine; poetry is a vestal virgin; the law gets on our nerves; poetry soothes our savage breast. Any Dogberry may know the law, go to; only the illuminati may be poets or appreciate poetry. We will wager that Mayor Taylor knows himself a better poet than lawyer; and we will also wager that most people think he is a better lawyer.

The Girl, the Duke and the King

After much bickering and persuasion (coupled with some little sniffling and sneering, so 'tis said) Victor Emanuel, king of divine right and good fortune over all the Italians, has granted permission to the Duke d'Abruzzi to marry Miss Katherine Elkins of West Virginia. The royal consent was only gained, however, after d'Abruzzi had advised his royal cousin that the wedding would probably take place whether he liked it or not, the royal endorsement being only a small part of the program. King Victor hemmed and hawed and gave out extensive interviews to the newspapers, tending to show that Italy was not in need of America's millions; but in the end consented to be won over by his cousin's eloqeunce, and, with a regal wave of his kingly hand, bade the ceremony "go on." Blaine Elkins, the jolly young brother of the future duchess, almost spoiled d'Abruzzi's scheme of annexation by permitting himself to appear on the business end of a breach of promise suit just at the psychological moment. Imagine the duke's consternation when, in the midst of an harangue in defense of his fiancee the whole neighborhood resounded with cries of "Wuxtry! Wuxtry! All about younga da Elkins sued by da actress!" Of course Elkins, Jr., declares that it is a mistake and that he never, never promised to marry

Miss Lonsdale at all. Of course, too, he will eventually be able to propitiate the dainty soubrette with a sum considerably lower than the $100,000 which she has asked for. So there is really no danger of her being added to the already large family of Elkins, and thus exposing Italian royalty to the dangers of the billboards and footlights. "Still, ————;" said King Victor, ominously. Here d'Abruzzi regained his composure and whispered something into the kingly ear which was not for publication. Possibly it was a reminiscence, suggestive of other footlight favorites who were not so—oh, well, that is another story. Suffice it to say that the king relented and Miss Elkins will be married with the royal consent. Rumor tells us that the wedding is a love match, pure and simple. To prove the contention rumor points to d'Abruzzi's income (which to say the least is unparalleled in the record of Anglo-European alliances) and to the difficulties which have beset the young couple ever since their courtship began. Neither America nor Italy is wildly enthusiastic over the prospects of the match. America has had too many bitter experiences with royalty, while royalty retorts with a wild wail over its lost prestige. Miss Elkins is one of the most popular heiresses in the diplomatic set at Washington; d'Abruzzi is as well liked as any nobleman can be in a land where nobility is at a discount. Each has been urged to "stay on your own side of the fence," and patronize home industry. Ah, well, why argue about it? Cash and coronet will ever be drawn one to the other, it seems—attracted by that imperceptible something which makes for romance in this matter-of-fact old world. The duke could not avoid his ancestry any more than Miss Elkins could her millions. Probably he is not a Yarmouth nor a Castellane, and probably his affection for Miss Elkins may be as disinterested as Darbey's for Joan. At least, now that the wedding is assured, let us hope so.

Perspective Impressions

Says Bryan to Teddy, I have proposed more radical measures than you have." Says Teddy to William, "You're a liar." And there you are.

Mr. Michael Casey having failed to deliver the goods is now persona non grata to the reformers and they have suddenly discovered that he is not the finest street superintendent on earth.

Senator Gore says he thinks it is "beneath the dignity of the President of the United States to try to make Haskell or any other individual the issue of this campaign." Tut, tut! see who's President! And incidentally don't question his sentiments or you'll be charged with being a crook. Moreover, the intelligent, enlightened people of the United States will know that you're a crook.

Mr. Connolly, an ex-prosecuting attorney of Butte, who is now writing for a living, has been criticizing the courts of the country in Collier's Weekly, much to the delight of the Spreckels-Phelan organs. Which reminds us that the only men who know any law nowadays are not working at it. Boke, Kerr and Connolly—an invincible trio.

Henry Ach was called a liar by Francis Heney the other day, whereupon Judge Lawlor reprimanded Mr. Ach for causing Mr. Heney to lose his temper. Tampering with Heney is a crime against the dignity of the court.

Mr. Rudolph Spreckels says that he has quit the racing game because of the prominence of the betting feature. It took Mr. Spreckels fifteen years to discover the odiousness of this feature, but it should be remembered that it was only last season that his attention was called to the fact that a professional reformer with a racing stable is not a very convincing personality. Mr. Spreckels's inclinations are not consistent with his professions, but he has resolved to keep up appearances.

The question, "Shall the people rule?" appears to have been lost in the shuffle. Judging from the general character of this campaign, distinguished as it is for moral cowardice and made spectacular by a Chief Magistrate engaged in practicing the shabbiest tricks of the unscrupulous politician, it may not be amiss to suggest that we are rapidly approaching the inevitable crisis when the question, "Should the people rule?" will be up for solution, with the disgusted populace quite ready to answer in the negative.

The Drama on the Dissecting Table

By Stuart Jansen

Critics on stage conditions the world over are exercised just now over the moribund condition of the drama. European writers see ahead only a period of floundering amid wreckage. In America alone a few young dramatists are confident they discern beacon lights ahead and take an optimistic view of the situation. That the subject is being considered widely and deeply is evidenced by the many articles from eminent critics now being published in the best periodicals at home and abroad. Not only is the play itself on the table, but the learned doctors, scalpel in hand, are dissecting it with a view to discovering the fundamentals of success in order to stimulate those aenemic centers. Accordingly the author, the actor, the stage manager, the stage carpenter and the producer, nay, even the regulation theatre-goer, is each in turn passing unconsciously under the hands of the vivisectionist and the result is somewhat surprising. The surprise lies in the comments volunteered by these learned men and not in the fact that they do not agree.

One need seek no further than the cablegrams in the daily press to get an inkling of the unsettled and drifting condition of the drama. In France, where the ambitious playwrights of other lands have gone for so long to study technique, the stage is reported to be invaded by Bernard Shaw and a line of "unpleasant plays" that have upset the old standards and brought about a Babel of discussion, indicating that for the time being the blazed way is lost. Germany's dramatic centre is in turmoil over the modern movement, headed by Frank Wedekind, an actor, poet and playwright much admired by Bernard Shaw. Wedekind is anything but a nature fakir. One of his latest plays, "Spring's Awakening," is to be produced in New York shortly and critics declare that "Mrs. Warren's Profession" is angel food compared with it. Wedekind is at once called an ape and a prophet. Berlin has repudiated some of his performances which leave the ordinary mortal in doubt whether he purposes eternal problems or merely scoffs at the credulity of his audience. His plays at once provoke surprise, admiration, indignation, sneers and laughter. Appeals have been made to the courts to choke him off. It is admitted that his influence is growing not only in his own country but abroad. Today he is the dominant figure in the drama of Germany. "If," says one critic, "he often offends good morals, if he blasphemes God and emperors and kings, if he drags disreputable characters upon the stage and exposes to laughter the human weaknesses of respectable ladies and gentlemen, his motive is not meanness or malice, but an irrepressible love of truth and an overflowing knowledge of the ultimate secrets of the soul, in the revelation of which he is no more merciful to himself than to others."

In Russia the defeat of the Revolutionary movement is said to have resulted in a state of chaos in which the old lines of literary and dramatic endeavor have been engulfed. Cut off from the possibility of living for lofty ideals the great mass of disappointed young writers have rushed to the other extreme and are seeking to stifle their moral sense in depicting Saturnalian revels. The worst side of Wedekind is being glorified and sensuality is rampant. The leader of the school now in the saddle is Artzbashev. Under his empire rowdyism is king.

On the English stage the man of the hour is William Somerset Maugham, who has a half dozen plays now running in the London show houses, the record since the heyday of Wilde. His dramatic success has been remarkable and some English critics profess to see in it indubitable proof of the decay of the drama. Year after year Maugham offered his carefully prepared plays to managers and to the public only to be scorned and rejected. Then he carefully studied the situation, deliberately lowered his standards and created plays intended to be merely amusing, and financial success crowned him. At least three of his plays will be produced in New York this season; two of them by such players as Ethel Barrymore and John Drew. Mr. Maugham's views on the situation are naturally interesting. "I must say," he remarked in a recent interview, "I think there is a tremendous amount of nonsense talked about the serious drama. All that high falutin chatter about ideals! A playwright's and a missionary's appear to me to be two distinct and quite separate callings, which should not be permitted to overlap. I cannot understand why a serious play should be held to be pre-eminently greater or more important than a humorous play, a comedy for instance. Nor do I admit for a moment that the former is more difficult to write or demands a consideration peculiar to itself. The author's aim should be to amuse." Mr. Maugham goes on to discountenance the egotistical, self-preening talk of those superior persons who ascribe their failure to an inability or noble disinclination to "write down" to the presumably meaner apprehension of the vast majority of mankind. It is pointed out by other London guides that two prominent English playwrights of our time, Wilde and Shaw, were forced to indulge in clownish intellectual pranks to attract a measure of notice to themselves. Wilde is said to have taken the stage as he found it and so turned out "pot boilers." According to one critic "it is not the least of the crimes of the English theatre at the end of the nineteenth century that it could find nothing to do with a fine talent such as Wilde's save to degrade and waste it."

The late Bronson Howard attributed the present low condition of the drama in this country, as evidenced in the colossal percentage of failures, to the fact that the playwrights were ignoring the public and writing to please themselves. When Percy Mackaye was in this city supervising the initial production of his new play, during the recent Henry Miller engagement, he took occasion to point out a ray of hope in Howard's discovery. "To serve the American public," he said, "the native dramatist must to a certain extent ignore it. He must turn a deaf ear to its demands in so far as those demands are prompted by an unenlightened or a misguided taste. If the public persists in making foolish demands, the fault rests chiefly with the nature of its theatrical education, and the dramatist, remembering this, must not lose faith. Our dramatists," he asserted, "cannot believe too staunchly in the inherent human worth of the public. Indeed it is precisely because they have too long ignored in the public the fine and beautiful instincts which are potential in it, and catered instead to the petty and ignoble instincts which are actual in it, that our dramatists have expressed so little that is of lasting service to the public."

The iconoclasts, or rather the radicals in the American field, hold success to be the final test, the desideratum and in dissecting the means towards this end they tell the dramatist to go way back and sit down. After carefully combing over the situation they pronounce the author the most superfluous person about the theatre. In order to insure success a play must sometimes be written about a pretty face, or a clever comedian's legs, or a happy back set conceived by an inspired stage carpenter. By this school Frohman and Belasco are credited with making the dramatic successes of many playwrights who would have failed ignominiously without a freak cast and stage management in the superb production of their plays.

The Law of Tiberius

Being a Brief and Cursory Review of the Use and Abuse of Informers and the Spy System Under the Reign of an Infamous and Cruel Despot; and Showing by a Modern Instance That the Processes of Such Prostitution of Persecutions Has Not Materially Altered for the Better in the Course of Two Thousand Years.

By Democritus.

If Judge Lawlor will take down his dusty Tacitus, and put himself in his best judicial state of mind, reading for exemplary edification rather than for historical information, he will find much food for his thought. I address myself to Judge Lawlor in this manner, and not to the other leading protagonists of the graft prosuction, for the following reasons, to wit: (1) The Chief Prosecutor (nominally) has probably never heard of Tacitus; (2) the Real Prosecutor (Mr. Heney) has probably forgotten his Tacitus; and (3) Mr. Spreckels refuses to read Tacitus because that eminent historian approved the slaughter of the Spreckels ancestry by the Roman legions two thousand years ago on the banks of the Elbe and Weser —it is impossible for a Spreckels to mitigate or palliate an hereditory prejudice; or any other prejudice, for that matter.

Judge Lawlor, however, is of quite another sort. The real bent of Judge Lawlor's mind is philosophical; his apparent preference for the material, the obvious and the banal, is entirely the result of his association, his environment, and his affiliation with the kind of politics that Lawlorizes the judiciary. I am sure that when Judge Lawlor was reading his Tacitus with the delight that always accrues from that perusal he unconsciously imbibed a vast amount of the practical philosophy contained in the work of the great historian described by Gibbon as "the first of historians who applied the science of philosophy to the study of facts." I am convinced that although Judge Lawlor has long been unfamiliar with the text of his Tacitus, he has never departed from the precepts which were in that reading impressed on his plastic, receptive, almost supersensitive understaning. This reminder will, I have not the slightest doubt, recall the annalist's moral observation to the effect that few are qualified, by their own reflection, to mark the boundaries between vice and virtue. He will probably remember that the corrollary of this remark was a positive declaration that to separate the useful from that which leads to destruction, is not the talent of every man, and that, therefore, the example of others is the school of wisdom.

The example of Tiberius Caesar as set forth in the Annals of Tacitus is, in my opinion, the school in which Judge Lawlor has acquired much of the wisdom which he so lavishly displays on the bench. Tiberius Caesar is clearly his precedent in one of his most drastic rulings, namely, that the prosecution has the right to inquire into the character, opinions, history and private concerns of any or all citizens drawn to serve as jurymen in cases within the jurisdiction of the court over which he presides. Tiberius, we are told by Tacitus, instituted this legal procedure as one of the basic principles of his tyranny, and it proved, in the end, "the most detestable invention that ever harassed mankind."

Under the Tiberian method of procuring convictions a new trade sprang into existence—the trade of the informer. Detectives were at every man's door, spies dogged the footsteps of the most illustrious citizens, ears were in all the walls of Rome, eyes were peering through every portal. No man's life was safe, the virtue of every woman was at the mercy of a dastardly crew of sneaks and perjurers. Terror pervaded every household. Avarice goaded the son to accuse his father; greed incited the wife to betray her husband; traps were laid, snares were sprung, confidences were violated, hideous tales were invented, perjury was a fine art, and the infamous tide of prosecutions surged to the very doors of Tiberius, whose suspicion and hatred included in its dark and deadly scope even the members of his own family. The minister of all this evil was Sejanus, the emperor's favorite, whose tongue continually poured poison into the too ready ear of his master. And finally even Sejanus succumbed to the policy he had probably suggested; by which he had long prospered.

These informers were allowed one-fourth of the confiscated estates of their victims, and most of them were urged to their damnable practices by the meanest of human desires—avarice. Thus impelled Vibius Serenus accused his father of the same name. They appeared before the Senate. The father had been banished. He was now dragged from his retreat, deformed with filth, and loaded with irons; a spectacle of misery. His son came forward in trim apparel, ease in his mien, and alacrity in his countenance. He charged the old man with a conspiracy against the life of the emperor, with sending emissaries into Gaul to kindle the flame of rebellion; and thus the son in a double character, at once the accuser and the witness. He add that Caecilius Cornutus, of praetorian rank, supplied the accomplices with money. Cornutus, weary of life, and knowing that a prosecution was a prelude to destruction, laid violent hand on himself.

The father cursed his unnatural son in these words: "Restore me, just and vindictive gods, restore me to my place of banishment, far from the sight of men, who suffer such an outrage to humanity. For this parricide, may your vengeance in due time overtake his guilt."

After the condemnation of Serenus, a motion was made in the Senate that as Cornutus had dispatched himself, that whenever the person accused of violated majesty prevented judgment by a voluntary death the informers should be entitled to no reward. The fathers inclined to that opinion; but Tiberius, in plain terms, without his usual ambiguity, showed himself the patrons of the whole race of reformers; and to these words of the gloomiest, most vindicitive of all the murderous emperors of Rome in her worst days, I call the special attention of Judge Lawlor, asking him if on the ruling of Tiberius he has based his own interpretation of the privileges and necessity of informers, detectives, spies, eavesdroppers, delatores mouchaids and sneakcops to shadow talesmen and dog them, with authority to pry into their inmost concerns and their most sacred relations and confidences.

"The course of justice," said Tiberius, "would be stopped, and, by such decision, the commonwealth would be brought to the brink of ruin. It were better to abrogate all laws at once. If we must have laws, let us not remove the vigilance that gives them energy."

In this manner, comments Tacitus, that pernicious crew, the bane and scourge of society, who, in fact, have never been effectually restrained, were now let loose, with the wages of iniquity in view, to harass and destroy their fellow citizens.

When Judge Lawlor has thus refreshed his recollection of these ancient precedents, I advise him to pass the horrible thing along to Prosecutor Heney and Prosecutor Langdon, to Mr. Spreckels, the patron of the prosecutors, and to Detective Burns, the chief of the gang of informers now in the pay of the graft prosecution. I am satisfied that these square-dealing, high-minded, incorruptible, holier-than-the-rest-of-us citizens will swell to ox-like proportions with pride in the thought that they have performed their duty to the commonwealth in a manner befitting the best practices of Roman jurisprudence and with means similar to those most approved by that eminent imperial assassin, Tiberius Claudius Nero Caesar.

The Gypsy

By Abraham Reisin

Lisa was an ordinary girl. She had black eyes and black hair; but are there so few girls likewise blessed? She is slightly above the average in height, but many of her chums are as tall. Lisa graduated from the Gymnasium with high honors, but did not her friends read the newest of books, Chekhov, Gorky and Andriev? All her friends and acquaintances are at home with these authors. Withal she was but an ordinary girl; that is, when she is present at a gathering, at a ball or wedding, she does not possess that something which might tend to single her out from her sisters. She is lost in the crowd of other girls.

Lisa knows this well, and the knowledge of it brings her pangs of sorrow. In this respect she is not ordinary. Lisa wishes to be marked out by some extraordinary trait. In an assemblage of people she does not like to be identified with the crowd, but wishes to be known apart from it. This feeling was developed in her to the extent of a disease, and if people were better able to peep within her soul, Lisa would be regarded as out of the ordinary.

Lisa did possess good qualities, but these virtues were not the superficial ones which folks could point out, but inner ones. For instance, if she found herself at a ball, or a similar public gathering, where all the company would talk, laugh and jest, she would retire to a corner in studied thoughtfulness, making herself romantically sad and pretending that she saw no one but her inward self. At such moments she was indeed extraordinary. But the crowd did not even notice her, and Lisa would become lonesome in her retreat and in her anger she would keep herself aloof from the circle. And the pain would be more intense whenever it happened that among those about her there was one who caught the eyes and attention of all. At these moments Lisa would keenly feel her unattractiveness, and feelings of hatred for the unconscious object of her jealousy would mingle with her pain. But she usually remained with the crowd dancing around the star, who was indeed proud, but gracious and friendly to Lisa.

In the circle in which Lisa found herself it was decided to give a ball. A certain happy, jolly girl, an intimate friend of Lisa, advised that it should be a costumed affair.

"A masquerade ball?" someone asked.

"No; not a masquerade ball," she exclaimed, "without masks, but in costumes."

The suggestion met with approval, and Lisa, who had black eyes and black hair, selected the costume of a gypsy, upon the advice of her many friends. Her long, black tresses she let fall loosely in seeming disorder upon her shoulders; in the center of her coiffure she placed a clasp of brilliant jewels and draped her shoulders with a deep red shawl. Thus she appeared at the ball. At the cloak-room she could not help seeing the attendant gaze upon her and her costume with a look of interest and smiling satisfaction. Lisa was frightened and at the same time overjoyed, and with this feeling she entered the ballroom.

She was met with a salutation of bravos by a whole retinue of young people. For the moment she was embarrassed, but a friend at once approached her and reassured her.

"Oh, how beautiful you are, how interesting!"

"Really?" Lisa naively asked, and her heart commenced to flutter.

"Wonderful! See how all are staring at you."

Lisa raised her eyes and met the gaze of a hundred others. She lowered her own, but soon accustomed herself to the attention she was attracting. A moment later a young man walked up to her, one of the prominent ones who had heretofore never noticed her.

"I seek the good fortune, fraulein, of the first dance with you."

Before she had time to reply, another approached her and with an admiring look, not speaking, but almost singing: "Beautiful gypsy—let me be fortunate for once in a short, foolish life—do not deny me—to dance the first dance with—"

"Already taken," the other announced in a tone of decision and pleasure.

She danced with both. Both pleased her. Both pressed her tenderly, gazed upon her lovingly. She could not dance much with these two. Others were there to claim her. They snatched her from the chair when she would sit to try to steal a minute's rest.

"Oh, how beautiful is the gypsy, how interesting!" Words like these greeted her on all sides. She wished for a moment of rest in which she could fully realize the good fortune which had so suddenly and unexpectedly come upon her. But this was denied her.

"I beg of you, beautiful gypsy, a quadrille?" Like a fairy she glided about the large dance hall. The red shawl upon her shoulders was like wings which would lift her on high; the loose flowing hair, raven black, flowed out in gypsy wildness and entangled itself in the red drapery, and all of this rendered Lisa the more remarkable and picturesque. They "devoured her with their eyes." One, of whom Lisa had never dared before this even to think, made love to her during the dance. She felt that he kissed her black hair and she caught her breath for joy.

Finally the crowd in the hall thinned out, the clock struck four, and many voices were heard in favor of ending the dance. Lisa felt as if there was coming a close to a great holiday, which perhaps would never come again. She was lost in thought.

"Adieu," spoke the one who had announced his love to her. "Thanks for the pleasure you have given me with your beautiful costume."

"Adieu," Lisa forced herself to smile, but she did not succeed. There was a cloud upon her face, and it seemed that even the red shawl paled.

Returning home, Lisa stood before the glass and once more looked at her costume. She looked and she looked and she tried to find out the secret of her recent success. She is really beautiful, really interesting in the gypsy costume. But she cannot put it on the following day; therefore tomorrow she would become again the ordinary Lisa, so like unto thousands of others. She removed the clasp from her hair, and it appeared to her as if she were casting away a fortune with her own hands. She pinned the clasp again to her hair. Fortune had come. But how can she retain it?

She cannot go around every day in gypsy costume. If she would put it on tomorrow and go out upon the street, would they not ridicule her?

What is this thing, Lisa thinks, in fear and dread. She has already grasped fortune. She possesses it, yet she cannot retain it. By accident she bounded into luck, but it lasted for a night only. How many nights, long and dreary, will she be forced to wait till fortune comes again? And will it ever come? No! The luck would never return.

How extraordinary, how strange? Her fate lies in a gypsy costume—in a clasp—in a red shawl, and loose flowing hair. She pressed her lips together in a bitter smile. "Wild and foolish are your hopes," the gypsy answered her from the glass, and angrily Lisa pulled the clasp from her hair, the red shawl from her shoulders. "Gone, fortune! Ha, ha, ha!" and she broke out in hysterical laughter.

Again she was but an ordinary girl.

The Spectator

An Incomplete Story

The Chronicle of Tuesday last contained a report of the death in the Old Ladies' Home of Mrs. Laura Patterson, aged 77 years. According to the Chronicle Mrs. Patterson was found Thursday, September 17th, lying in her nightgown on the floor of her room, helpless, speechless and partially unconscious. And according to Dr. Rumwell, as quoted in the Chronicle, "the old lady could not have lain in her pitiful condition more than twenty-four hours and probably not longer than eight hours." From the Chronicle article it does not appear that anyone has charged that the Home authorities were guilty of negligence, but it does appear that there is some question with reference to the time spent by Mrs. Patterson on the floor, for it is obvious that the writer of the article sought to explain why there is no record of Mrs. Patterson's whereabouts from Monday, September 14th, when she reported to the office of the Home that she was going across the bay, until Thursday morning when an attendant found her on the floor. "Contrary to the rules of the establishment," says the Chronicle, " she had failed to report her return and when she had fallen helpless with the iron grip of paralysis upon her throat and limbs it was only a question of how long she would lie there before some house attendant should open the door." And further: "It is believed that having entered the Home late Wednesday night she had put off reporting her return until the following day." All of which provokes my curiosity. I am not at all satisfied with this story of the death of Mrs. Patterson. I am curious to know why it should be assumed that she returned late Wednesday night? If she did not report her return, how does anybody know when she returned? Dr. Rumwell may guess, but a doctor's guess in such a matter isn't worth much. According to the Chronicle he bases his guess on her "general condition" when found. What was her general condition? I am told that her hands and face, as a result of her writhings on the floor, were in a frightful state. Surely not from this circumstance does Dr. Rumwell conclude that the old lady was lying on the floor not more than eight hours.

Where Was Mrs. Patterson?

Until last week I never heard a word in disparagement of the management of the Old Ladies' Home, but on the death of Mrs. Patterson, even before the appearance of the Chronicle article, I heard a story of the circumstances of the old lady's death which caused me to wonder whether the inmates are receiving proper care and attention. The Chronicle article does not serve to allay whatever suspicion had been aroused in my mind. It reads as though it had been written to silence criticism, the author turning out a bad job. Evidently he lacked persuasive material. If Mrs. Patterson went across the bay on Monday, September 14th, and did not return until the following Wednesday night, where did she spend the interval of time? It seems to me that this is a question of sufficient importance for solution. The trustees of the Home ought to want to know where Mrs. Patterson was between Monday and Wednesday night. If they find out that she was at a friend's home across the bay then they will be sure that Dr. Rumwell made a good guess. Mrs. Patterson had several friends from whom it should be easy to learn the identity of her friends across the bay and it should not be difficult to trace her movements.

Another Version

According to my informant, whom I regard as a pretty good authority, the circumstances surrounding Mrs. Patterson's death are not exactly as they have been reported in the Chronicle. Mrs. Patterson had accepted an invitation to a tea which was given on Tuesday, September 15th. She did not attend the tea, nor did she send her regrets or any explanation of her failure to attend. As she was a rather punctilious woman her failure to keep her engagement caused some anxiety and the lady who invited her to the tea sought her at the Home on Wednesday. She knocked at the door of Mrs. Patterson's room, and receiving no response assumed that her friend was out, and she went away. I am told that the lady called again Thursday, and met with the same experience, and that it was not until Friday that Mrs. Patterson was found. I am not vouching for the perfect accuracy of this statement. I know how easy it is for errors to creep into versions of the simplest occurrences, but I feel that it is very important that the management of the Old Ladies' Home should be characterized by great solicitude for the welfare of the inmates and therefore I wish to awaken the zeal of the trustees and impress upon them that it is their duty to spare no effort in ascertaining all the facts with reference to Mrs. Patterson's death.

Misled by a Headliner

I picked up a daily newspaper published in this city the other day and I read this headline: "Savants Discuss Mystic Problems." Mystery has always interested me, especially the sort called "mystic." I am particularly interested in the investigations of the Society for Psychial Research, with one headquarters in Boston and another in London. The headline promised something in this variety of mysticism and I prepared my mind for the reception of new and startling information concerning telepathic communications between the adepts of Soho and the mahatmas of Benares; of authenticated haunted houses in the suburbs of Salem and Gloucester; of corroborated cases in which eidolons of the recently dead had appeared to friends at a distance at the precise moment of dissolution; of premonitions, presentiments, apparitions, preternaturalism and premonstrations. The "hanging head" of the article engendered the suspicion that perhaps I was barking up the wrong tree. It informed me that a "Philosophical Union" had "arranged for a series of meetings throughout the winter." The article itself was a complete disillusionment. There was nothing "mystic" in it. The announcement merely set forth that some of the leading scientists of Berkeley would discuss subjects of strictly scientific interest in a wholly scientific manner. One of the "savants" would speak on "Scientific conceptions of life and its manifestations"; another would say something concerning "the continuity of life"; still another was billed to tell what he knew of "the chemical basis of mental phenomena"; David Starr Jordan was down for a discourse on "the present status of the evolution problem"; Pliny Earle Goddard, assistant professor of anthropology at the University was scheduled to trace "lines of social ascent as indicated by the study of primitive mankind." Science, not mysticism, was the theme throughout. I was not so much disappointed as disgusted to think that I had been misled by that "mystic" headline. I was glad to know that so much science was abroad in one aggregation over in Berkeley, but the thought obtruded: What did that headline artist think he was captioning when he "played up" the deceptive announcement that savants would discuss "mystic" problems? Did he think that science is a "mystic problem"? Did he confound the Philosophical Union of Berkeley with the Society for Psychical Research whose double headquarters are in London and Boston with spiritual affiliation with the Society of Advanced Philosophy and close affinity with the Universal Association for the Promulgation and Propagation of the Esoteric Doctrines of Oriental Philosophies?

Unpopular Science

I glanced through the list of subjects for discussion by these philosophers. I discovered that some of the most important "problems" of human existence would be reviewed by some of the ablest thinkers of the University. The program included nearly all that is up to date in biological science. But, I thought, how much of this would interest the average reader of the daily newspaper? how much of it will be "reported" at length in the daily newspapers? how much of it will ever be known beyond the narrow circle in which it is uttered? Alas, that Nat Goodwin's divorce suit should occupy so much space in the newspapers and Professor Ritter's exposition of life from the biologist's standpoint so little; what a pity that the reading populace should take so little interest in the significance of the biological history of man as expounded by Professor Merriam, and that this same populace should so greedily devour every detail of some "murder mystery" "worked up" by the newspapers to fill in the dearth of a dull day for news. Sad to relate that it is not the habit of the people to pay much heed to the wisdom of the Osterhouts, the Robertsons, the Strattons, the Merriams and the Ritters of the State University scientific departments; while with eager attention and absorbing credulity they pore over the pseudo-science and scientific romance of the Flammarions, the Servisses, the Teslas and the Larkins whose vain imaginings fill so much waste area of the yellow press.

Science While You Wait

My old friend Garrett P. Serviss has discovered that "our sister planet" Venus is now in the travail and parturition of the carboniferous period of its development. He says that Venus was born about a million years after the earth was evolved from chaos, and that she is now in process of laying in the material for her coal supply. When our planet shall have arrived at the period of her dotage Venus will be in the prime of her planetary career; all the clouds that lower over her now will be dissipated; all the glaciers that crawl over her damp bosom will be resolved to flowing rivers and commerce-bearing oceans; the giant ferns that now comprise her only vegetation will in that far-distant aeon be in the possession of a coal trust; and Professor Serviss is assured by his prophetic consciousness that when all this has happened on Venus there will be a race of beings there whose intelligence will far surpass that of earthly humanity. Imagination is not given to every scientific gent. Some of them are pretty good guessers if they can find a peg on which to hang their guess; but most of them guess backward—very few of them dip into the future as far as the eye of Serviss can see. Deduction is common enough with scientists of the unimaginative school, and inference is allowable in the practice of the scientific tirade; but absolute prophecy is not included among the rules of the game. Professor Serviss is, therefore, a man after the "popular" heart, like Jules Verne, Edgar Allan Poe, Gustave Flammarion, Professor Wells, the savant who prophesied how the world would come to an end, Professor Gulliver, who described the country of the Brobdignaggians and the kingdom of the Lilliputians, and Baron Munchausen, whose essays in archaeology, paleontology, ethnology and zoology delighted the youth of our grandfathers. Professor Edgar Allan Larkin is also a popular scientific idol, but his popularity is different. When we want to revel in the unknown and the impossible we read Professor Serviss; when we want to know anything from the ground up, inside out, under, over and through, we write to Professor Larkin. But between these two scientists we are able to satisfy all our yearnings for scientific lore; from Professor Serviss we get the romance of science and from Professor Larkin we get the facts. What Professor Serviss doesn't know Professor Larkin supplies on demand. What Professor Larkin does know Professor Serviss makes more knowable. Professor Larkin gives us figures of distance and measurement; Professor Serviss gives us figures of speech. I have read Professor Larkin and I have read Professor Serviss and I must confess that I prefer Professor Puddle, the eminent savant of Chicago.

The Heiress—"But why should I marry you. I don't love you."

Her Suitor—"Oh, that's all right. I sha'n't be home very much.

"Grub-Staking" the "Digs"

I was sure that my efforts to discredit the trivial "activities" of the students at the State University would bear fruit. I knew that somewhere in the great outside somebody was reading my remarks on the waste of precious time now in progress at Berkeley among the frivoling "sets," "cliques," "frats," "sororities" and "athletes"; and I was convinced that in due time this person would come to my assistance in the work of teaching the students the folly of their ways. I learn from my usual source of information that "an unknown" has presented a purse of gold to the President of the University to be given as a "grub stake" to some deserving student "working his way through college." The amount thus "donated" by my unknown coadjutor is $349, and the money will be bestowed at the discretion of President Wheeler. The young man or young woman who will receive this largess will be poor, honest, industrious, ambitious, worthy, unhonored save by the commendation of the preceptors, unsung save in the praise of those who watch the struggle approvingly. If it shall be a young man he will probably be one of those contemptuously designated

"digs"; a "dig" who digs in his studies and maintains himself at the University by digging in somebody's garden. His name will not be found in the list of those who belong to a "frat," nor among those who are "eligible" for the football team. He will be the student who is earning his education by the sweat of his face and his brain, striving for a definite goal which he will certainly achieve. If it shall be a young woman she may be found in somebody's home where she is assisting the family to conduct the affairs of the household; humbly accepting whatever may be offered in the way of bread and shelter in return for the privilege of knowing more at the end than she would have known if she had frittered her time in the "social activities" of the sororities and the Greek letter societies whose symbols are probably better understood by this non-member than they are by those who wear the "society pins" so ostentatiously. I hope that this is only the first of these "grub stakes" for deserving students of the University. There are hundreds of generous givers who can appreciate from their own experience how hard it is for a man to get an education in an American college or university. Many of these will, I am sure, follow the thoughtful and generous example of the "unknown donor" in this instance. And some day the students who "scraped through" but emerged with "social prestige" and the right to wear a fraternity or soroity pin, will be glad to accept small jobs and gratuitous favors from the young men and the young women who were assisted by the "grub stakes." This bread cast on the waters will return after many days; and some of it will be cake for the deserving, while some of it may be crusts for those who are unworthy of even a crust.

A Startling Explanation

Periodically Berkeley furnishes proof of the advantage of higher education for women. The latest evidence goes satin-shod across the campus, for there is a determined effort to deny the public all knowledge of the affair. An austere boarding house keeper, who has more vinegar in her makeup than goes into a properly mixed French salad dressing, recently ordered the four young ladies who were settled under her roof to move. Now it is not an easy matter in the middle of the term to find suitable quarters for oneself and all the impedimenta which decorate the room of the ubiquitous college girl. The girls said that the hash served was an onioned sepulchre, but having buried their fastidiousness they preferred to stay on. However the landlady was obdurate, and ordered them out into the cold academic world, sparsely settled with good boarding houses. Promptly on hearing the ultimatum given her darling daughter one of the mothers journeyed down from her country home personally to conduct the hegira of her girl. She demanded an explanation of the landlady, of course, and it came with amazing frankness. The young ladies were ordered out because she would not shelter a band of poker players who rattled chips with the clatter of an early hour milk wagon and were always remiss in paying their board bills in consequence!

Kept the "Kitty" Quiet

Naturally the cat did not pop out of the bag without mewing at the top of its lungs. Mother investigated and discovered that the kitty engrossed more attention than the curriculum at college. As she is president of the Ladies' Aid Society of the Baptist church in her home town, her horror could have been measured by a yard stick. It was only by the practice of the fine arts of logic, rhetoric and flim-flammery that the girls induced her not to report the thing to the President of the University or the Dean of the women students. The girls promised to put such things as "diamond flushes" and "four of a kind" out of their fair young lives. A mother's tears and the repentant protestations of the young ladies finally had an effect on the landlady, and she agreed to let them finish the term under her desecrated roof.

Exchanging the Terms

From the technical knowledge which the college girls display in discussing the affair it is safe to affirm that a number of the girls are familiar with this particular branch of the manly arts. In the boarding houses open to students of both sexes quiet little games of poker are indulged in, some chap who is a "born teacher" always coming forward to instruct the untutored girls. The knowledge plays ring around the rosie until the number of girls who can play are scattered as the leaves of Vallombrosa.

Berkeley's Vexatious Problem

Berkeley is expressing its troubles just now in town meetings, family confabulations and muttered imprecations. Like many plain, ordinary, less intellectual individuals Berkeley is just now in a financial hole, some $34,000 in fact, and the meetings and the confabulations are being held to devise ways and means of scrambling out. The shortage scrapes the raw of the aristocratic town, because she is now obliged to do without street lights o' nights and the police force is cut down to such scant numbers that the anxious citizens in outlying districts are obliged to combine to do their own policing; the fire department is barely scraping along and, sad to relate, the insurance companies have raised rates on account of the lessened protection afforded homes in that beautiful but hapless burg. Mathematical heads in the University have figured out that already the raise in insurance rates exceeds the $34,000 shortage. The town Solons see all sorts of losses of this character looming up on account of this troublesome shortage. The most likely suggestion that has come out of the interminable debates on the question is a proposition to issue the necessary bonds and get back once more into the street light and police protection of a solvent town. The abject condition of affairs was aptly set forth by one of the discharged policemen, still in uniform, who was packing his kit along the dusty road out of town, headed for a job. "Hulloa!" grinned a taxpayer who knew him, "where are you bound for, Jim?" "For the Pinole powder works. I've got a job there." "Why, you are likely to be blown out of the place any day and lose your job." "Faith, and that's no worse than happened to me here, and I get me money."

Nat Goodwin's Explanation

Actor and mining promoter Nat Goodwin feels inexpressibly pained that the reading public should infer that his sealed complaint for divorce against Maxine Elliott, recently filed in Reno, contains anything savoring of charges of impropriety on her part. Accordingly he has just issued the following official announcement of his actions and intent in the proceedings, together with an incidental explanation of the cause of the suit: "My reason for seeking to divorce Mrs. Goodwin is that she and I have been unable to agree as to a place of abode. Mrs. Goodwin prefers England and the circle of swelldom there, to which she has full entree, while I prefer Nevada and the mines. For the past three years each of us has been trying to bring the other to an agreement on this disputed point, but as Mrs. Goodwin cannot forego her English home and friends and as I do not feel as if I should forego Nevada and my mining interests, agreement has been impossible. After repeated efforts to effect a reconciliation on this one point and finding my efforts unavailing, I brought the action for divorce.

His Correspondence With Maxine Elliott

"While this action has been started, the kindliest feelings and relations exist between Mrs. Goodwin and myself. Only a few days ago I wrote her a letter in which I expressed the kindest regards for her, wished her every success in her independent theatrical venture in New York, and made bold to propose some advice regarding the management of the theatre. Miss Elliott replied in an equally gracious manner and thanked me for my suggestions. Many of the unsavory and malicious reports regarding our domestic relations, which found their way into Eastern newspapers, have been copied by the San Francisco newspapers. These reports are one and all malicious and are totally unfounded. With the greatest emphasis I wish to express my regard for the honor and chastity of my wife. Such a thought as that she could ever be unfaithful to her marriage vows has never entered my mind. My relations with her and her family have always been, and now are, of a kindly and cordial character. I have no intention of entering the matrimonial relation at the present time, and should I ever again decide to do so, after the divorce for which I have applied shall have been granted, the public will be duly advised in advance of such purpose."

Under the Silken Robe

Within a few days Harry Melvin has had his name changed from the familiar, hail-fellow, known-him-since-boyhood, jovial-companion cognomen, to that which he received soon after his admission to the bar at which all men are called to practice in spite of their infantile protest; he is no longer addressed as "Harry"; he is now Henry Melvin when he is not "Judge" Melvin. Harry Melvin of the clubs and the gathering places of wits and bon vivants is not himself directly responsible for the change. He has borne the merry, happy, appropriate surname all his life and he is probably as conscious in his new name as those who think it fitting that he should wear it. Even as Judge of the Superior Court of Alameda county he was "Harry" to all who came to know him; but when the judicial ermine of the Supreme Court fell upon his shoulders from the hand of Governor Gillett he was at once vested with a dignity and a solemn grandeur that precluded all personal familiarity. When we write of him now we spell him Henry Melvin, and when we speak to him in the street we call him Judge Melvin. But the leopard can only change his spots from place to place; a man'a a man for a' that; the singing voice of Henry Melvin is as sweet and thrilling as the melodious baritone of the Harry Melvin that sang at Bohemian jinks or rejoiced the herded Elks; the quips, quirks, sallies and jests, the flash of scintillant humor, and the sparkle of whimsical fancy are as prevalent in this Melvin of the long robe and the woolsack as they were in the "Old Athenian Days" when a bare floor, a low rostrum and a borrowed piano were all that were required to furnish forth a symposium to delight the hearts of men who might have been welcome at Petronian revels or gladly acclaimed at wit-feasts of Attic Nights. So we who know this Melvin as he really is and as he will be to the end of the chapter are not awed by the new dignity that has been thrust upon him by an honorable ambition; he is still, for us, the old Harry; the tuneful, jest-loving, nimble-witted, playful, merry and wise lord of our misrule and master of our revels. Let him interpret the musty law for others; we will remember his interpretation of "what things have been done at the Mermaid"; let him hand down learned decisions from the high and awful bench on which he sits; we will read them between the lines of his cited precedents and his formal references to "strict statutes and most biting laws," and behind it all we shall hear the voice of the singer and the jest of the real man; we shall view him in his new role as a magistrate in masquerade—not the unfamiliar Henry Melvin of the sycophantic press, not as the Judge Melvin of the bar and chambers, but as the Harry Melvin of the "Old Athenian," the Harry Melvin of those happy days when the joy of living was what we lived for, when our cake was sweet and our ale only as bitter as we would have it; those days when we knew how to laugh and

Even the Reporter Nods

Something in the nature of paralysis must have afflicted the wrists of several talented reporters on the occasion of the flaying of the Hon. Francis J. Heney by Mr. Rudolph Spreckels' ex-attorney, Mr. Henry Ach. That spirited performance occurred last week in the august presence of Judge William P. Lawlor. For dramatic intensity it approximated the most memorable of the many stirring episodes of the graft prosecution—Abe Ruef's confession before Judge Dunne. When Abe, palpitant with repentance and in strict accordance with program, converted himself into a fountain of tears and told the sad story of his downfall his well-simulated emotion was infectious, but the newspaper reporters were not incapacitated by the tautness of their feelings from giving us a graphic, colorful picture abounding in human interest. It made Abe himself weep again. The picture of the Ach-Heney incident was a veritable potboiler of journalism. As an attempt to convey an idea of the thing depicted it was a prodigious failure. Not even a feeble sense of what had occurred could be derived from the composite conceptions which the reporters attempted to render accessible to our apprehension. They did little more than tell us that Heney and Ach had a verbal tilt and from the details which they supplied one might infer that it was one of the usual little scraps that enliven the monotony of the Ruef case. As a matter of fact it was unique inasmuch as Mr. Heney, who is generally regarded as an irresponsible chinster, an exhaustless source of impassioned verbiage, conducted his end of the dramatic sketch after the manner of the husband in that masterly farce, "The Silent System." For the first time in his life Mr. Heney was struck almost speechless. So sudden, overwhelming and resistless was Henry Ach's onslaught, so withering the artillery of his pervervid rhetoric, that as he thundered his denunciation into the ears of the celebrated prosecutor the latter reeled and gasped and plunged, and all the while it was evident from his feeble and incoherent ejaculations that in a euthanasia of thought he was struggling in vain to assemble the elements of a retort.

Ach's Epitome of a Patriot

What was it all about? I regret that I haven't the space to tell the whole story as it should be told. It is only for me to indicate to what extent the reporters failed. The incident had its inception in one of those brutal remarks that have become characteristic of Mr. Heney. He told the men in the jury box that Ach was "one of the ablest as well as one of the most unscrupulous men at the bar." Then it was that Ach, uncorking his vitriolic sentiments, proceeded to blister the tough hide of our renowned Bombastes Furioso. "You," he said, with emphasis on the pronoun, "you dare charge a man with being unscrupulous. You, with your record. You that were thrown out of the University of California and that fled from this State! Why did you leave? You went to Arizona, where you killed a man and where you were found guilty of tampering with a jury. You left that State. Why? You came back to this city and you signed a receipt for $30,000, about which you dare not open your mouth. According to the testimony of two clergymen you've committed perjury in this case. Because the defendant in this case wouldn't perjure himself you're prosecuting him, not to send him to jail but because you are still actuated by the sinister purpose of getting testimony which might enable you to gratify the vindictiveness of private individuals."

The Doubtful Quantity

During this impassioned recital which I have somewhat abridged Mr. Heney was struggling in the arms of Detective Burns, who was giving an imitation of a man trying to calm another. Heney, with the veins of his forehead standing out like whipcords, was trying to say something, but what it was nobody could conjecture. The man on the bench was so absorbed in the flaying of Heney that he gave the protagonists in the little drama their head, and the large audience was on edge in an atmosphere that throbbed with suppressed excitement. When Ach came to his first pause Heney attempted to interrupt. In a strident voice he exclaimed, "I—I—was—I came to this State before Mr. Ach—I—I was born—"

"I'd advise you to write the story of your life," said Ach in a tone of withering sarcasm. And he added: "There's lots of people who'd like to hear your explanation of some of the events of your career."

Again Heney struggled for an utterance, and Ach, with his forefinger waving in Heney's face, went on: "You say that you're half Irish and half German, but God only knows how much yellow there is in you." These words were uttered with superb dramatic effect, and Heney wilted. "You've probably got a gun in your pocket now," Ach continued, "but I'm not to be intimidated by you or any of your detectives. I tell you to your teeth what I think of you. I say that you're not prosecuting this case in good faith." When Heney finally recovered his power of speech he explained that he was fired from the University for horsewhipping a student who had lied about him in a college paper. And he added that if he had time he'd horsewhip the reporters in the daily papers who are employed by the higher-ups to abuse him. He said nothing of the mysterious receipt.

The Advantage of Family Division

By the recent brief appearance of Marshal Hale in the role of an anti-machine aspirant for the nomination for Congress in the fifth district, I was reminded of the advantage to be derived from family division in politics. There is a proverb which tells us that the house that is divided against itself must fall. All proverbs go more or less beyond the strict truth, and this one is no exception. I have noticed that the house which is not united in politics, and which is able to affiliate through individual members with each faction, always prospers. Of this the house of Hale Bros. is an exemplification, as we might have seen had the life of O. A. Hale been prolonged until this fall. For O. A. Hale, one of the most admirable of men, was an enthusiastic supporter of the machine, while his brother Marshal Hale has always been an active reformer. The Hale brothers have shown how it is possible, and even advantageous, to be in perfect harmony in business and at sword's points in politics. If O. A. Hale, the anti-reformer, had lived, perhaps Marshal Hale, the reformer, would now be running for Congress in the fifth district.

Where Genius Resides

There are some families that work this division scheme systematically and effectively. One of the most successful is that to which Judge Dunne imparts the prestige of his personality. Some years ago this family comprised four brothers. Two belonged to all the Catholic and Irish societies in town and two joined the Masons. Now that's a pretty strong hand to draw to. For as there is an irreconcilable conflict between the Catholic Church and the most powerful of fraternal orders it is obvious that the family that can achieve membership in both without causing the slightest jar is possessed of more than ordinary genius. The potency of this strategic distribution of family strength is hard to estimate. The family is still advantageously divided, though death has deprived it of the warm sympathy of the Knights of St. Patrick. The brother Masons, however, one of whom is Judge Dunne, are still in good standing I believe, and so, too, is the member of the Knights of Columbus.

The Good and Bad Partner

By way of explanation it should be stated that the principle of family division in politics is exploited after the manner of the partnership conflict in commercial affairs. There are many business firms in this city consisting of a "good" and a "bad" partner. The "good" partner is always lamenting the absence of amiable sentiment in the hard-hearted member of the firm. The courteous, generous, "good" partner holds the business by his affable ways and his willingness to do things which he can never do owing to the obdurateness of his associate. Something of the same relationship existed for a long time between Schmitz and Ruef. Schmitz posed as the fellow who wanted to favor his friends, but Ruef was beyond sentimental appeal. The same principle worked to advantage in the Spreckels family. Rudolph is the saint who never did an evil thing in his life. It wasn't Rudolph that sold out to the Sugar Trust or that worked the dear public in the role of a public benefactor in the gas deal. When the graft prosecution was started all but one member of the Spreckels family stood in the background, and the good Rudolph came to the front and struck a pose while all the fawning mercenaries of the press pointed to him as the one member of the Spreckels family without a blot on his scutcheon. But what a sorry looking scutcheon it is now!

their ardor and perspiration. The political strategists that are managing Judge Dunne's fight are men of vast experience and they may be depended upon to avail themselves of every accessible advantage and make good use of all the familiar means of persuasion. It has been their misfortune to meet with some recalcitrants and also to find that the other candidates for the Bench are not entirely devoid of political acumen and strength, but even under adverse conditions they have done very well. It is of course unfortunate for Judge Dunne that he failed to obtain the nomination of all parties, a calamity that must be attributed to the selfishness of such men as Hunt, Sturtevant, Cook and Van Nostrand, who, it appears, were not sufficiently magnanimous to yield all endorsements to Dunne, and thus award him the just recognition of his indisputable claim to all the virtues that constitute a just judge. But failing to make Judge Dunne the universal nominee the captains contrived to withhold from Hunt, Sturtevant, Cook and Van Nostrand the endorsement of the G. Government League, thus minimizing the chances of those gentlemen as much as possible, and making it clear that it doesn't matter what kind of material we get for the bench so long as Dunne is landed safe and sound.

Seven Cents a Name

So it is evident that the captains are pretty good strategists. They know their business. The hurrah will come later. Dunne must be elected. Didn't he convict Schmitz? Of course he did. The American people love a square umpire and an honest referee, but when it comes to selecting a judge they insist on getting a man who will see that a person whose guilt is generally acknowledged is handed the proper kind of punch. Isn't Judge Dunne that kind of man? Of course he is. Even though his friends neglected to tell us so we'd know he is. But his friends boisterously assert that he stands pre-eminent among judges by reason of his disposition to make it impossible for a man believed to be guilty to escape. They praise him not for being fair but for being on their side, which is always the right side. Therefore Dunne should be elected. And the public will be convinced that he should be elected. The captains tell us that the people are crazy for Dunne, but yet the cautious captains deemed it advisable to make Dunne the universal nominee so that if by chance the people should prove fickle they'd have to vote for Dunne. By way of convincing us of the people's passion for Dunne the captains tells us that voters are climbing over one another in their mad eagerness to sign Dunne's petitions. Where this spectacle has been presented we have not been informed. But let us not doubt the captains. Judge Dunne's petitions are circulating at a great rate. They are in the hands of men who are paid seven cents for each signature and therefore it is evident that Judge Dunne is being well financed. Naturally the petition-handlers are zealous workers, but some that I have met say that the job is a tough one, for in every block they meet with miserable scoundrels who use harsh and vulgar language with reference to Judge Dunne. These scoundrels unquestionably are in the pay of the higher-ups.

"A Tribute to a Friend from a Friend"

I have been requested to publish the following tribute to Lieutenant Selfridge, who was killed in the accident to the Wright aeroplane:

"With the tragic fate that befell Lieutenant Thomas E. Selfridge, there has been lost to use one of the noblest of young men. A man in the prime and flower of youth, he stood poised upon the threshold of fame, and in the very instrument that would have won him this fame he met his death. A most glorious cause we say, one that would serve his country in time of war; but that does not reconcile us to his end that came only too soon. Beloved by all who knew him, by his brother officers and his men, a devoted son, a good brother and a most loyal, true friend. His loss will be felt by all of those who had the privilege to know him and even by those who knew him only by reputation, for he had endeared himself to all by his manly conduct. He was one of those

'Strong men ranged on High
Who did his work, who held his peace
And had no wear to die.'"

A Poet's Dog

Poet Sterling has lost his she-dog Skeets and there is a great pother among the literati thereat. I read somewhere the other day that Skeets was an exceptional dog beloved of poets and artists and the dilletante en masse. She is intimately acquainted with Joaquin Miller and Charles Warren Stoddard, and her biographer says she was "immortalized" by Jack London. That's a big word, "immortalized." And it is questionable in my mind whether Jack London's processes for immortalizing dogs are equal to those that made "Rab" famous and conferred heroic glory on "Bob the son of Battles." I do know that Ambrose Bierce "immortalized" many dogs by calling them "snapdogs" and "damndogs," but he never mentioned them by name.

A Remedy for Skeets

The sudden disappearance of Skeets need not worry Poet Sterling beyond the necessity of writing a sonnet on his loss. Skeets has undoubtedly forgotten Poet Sterling by this time. The memory of a dog does not exceed the duration of forty-eight hours. We have read of dogs that grieved themselves to death over the corpse of their masters; but those tales were gross fables. A dog forgets more easily than a woman. Skeets is probably at this moment thinking of the bone she gnawed last night and longing for another. That is about the compass of Skeet's memory, and the hand that feeds Skeets is the hand that rules the affections of Skeets. Let Poet Sterling proceed with his sonnet—Skeets is asleep in her kennel, dreaming, perchance, of something good to eat. Her affections are self-centered and most of them abide in her stomach. That is the nature of dogs, and Poet Sterling's dog is only a dog and always a dog. Poet Sterling can probably sell his sonnet on Skeets for the price of another dog, and it will be easy for him to transfer his affections from one dog to another; as easy as it is for him to write a sonnet; as easy as it is for Skeets to transfer her affections from Poet Sterling to the person who is now feeding her.

Back to the Rivers of Babylon

Apropos my pedigreed willow which sources its ancestry in the tomb of Bonaparte a reader of Town Talk writes that the Solex Babylonica is sometimes called Pope's willow because it was grown by that poet in his garden at Twickenham, and that the Napoleon willow is a scion of Pope's willow. Thus does the pedigree of my petted willow grow with even greater energy than the vegetable itself. It grows while you wait, under the magic touch of my correspondent; thus: "The Pope willow was raised from a sprig found in a basket of Syrian figs, which carries you back within a few thousand years of the CXXXVII Psalm—

"We hanged our harps on the willows in the midst thereof.

For there they that carried us away captive required of us a song, and they that wasted us required of us mirth, saying, sing us one of the songs of Zion."

My recollection is that Pope was the first to cultivate the weeping willow in England. So far, so good, but my correspondent takes all the pride out of my potted plant in this fashion: "All the weeping willows in America are derived from the same parent, but the grand-children of a last-birthday baronet are none the less elated over their geneology by the reflection that we are all descendants of Father Adam."

A Protected Industry

Uncle Sam is at present in the throes of a moral spasm. Some time ago Congress enacted a law making it a felony to import a woman into this country for immoral purposes, and the local Federal authorities recently received instructions from Washington to get busy and round up and prosecute violators of the statute. The instructions are being obeyed, and henceforth the most ancient of all home industries will be vigorously protected, and the ranks of the unspeakable and most enduring of all professions will be recruited almost exclusively from American homes. While this new law apparently is pregnant with consequences not contemplated by Congress the courts have decided that it should be interpreted literally. Shortly after its enactment a man was arrested in New York for violating its provisions, and he pleaded that the woman involved was not a public character; that she was his mistress. The District Court held that in the circumstances there had been no violation of the law, but this decision was reversed by the Circuit Court of Appeals, which refused to differentiate Aspasia from Phryne.

THE WEEK'S FINANCIAL OUTLOOK.

By R. E. Mulcahy

Wall Street securities during the past week regained from seven to ten points of their decline of the week before. This was accomplished in the face of bitter political strife upon the part of both parties. That this element of war had no material effect upon prices may be regarded as showing who the real owners of securities are. It is certainly not the public. The leading features marketwise during the week have been the strength shown in Rock Island and St. Louis and San Francisco securties. Many rumors have been going the rounds as to the real cause of the upward move in them. It is more than half way sure that Harriman has been a buyer of Rock Island securities, and that it may be found at no distant date Harriman has acquired a controlling interest in the St. Louis and San Francisco property. This would prove a very good move on the part of Harriman. He would control the southwestern busines which is being threatened by the Colorado Southern and Stillwell's Oriental Lines. The Rock Island would then return to its former system, which by the way, it should never have left, and in time it would assume its old prestige. The railways of these United States are daily reaching the goal where a half dozen organizations will dominate the entire situation. The time is possibly not over ten years away, but not more than fifteen years at the latest, it will prove a good thing for the country at large. Few realize what a general change must come in transportation conditions when the Panama route is opened. It means that Western roads must build up their local territory, the interior must be developed. This particular feature may be noticed in many directions at the present time. The canal will prove a great source of education in the way of what can be occomplished in the line of building up new territory. The improved condition west of the Rockies, which will be in evidence ten years hence will surprise the most sanguine. The great empire lying between the Rocky Mountains and the Pacific Ocean is worthy of great improvement. Eastern capital will find its way west. Local foresight seems too narrow to fully appreciate the many advantages the Pacific Coast really has in store. It will be these advantages that will soon start the building of new lines of transportation west, north and south, and eventually network the entire coast. Electrical system are bound to play no small part in developing the country. Looking at the general conditions as they present themselves at the present time, one must be dull and narrow to fail to look sufficiently into the future to see otherwise than brightness, not alone for the Pacific Coast, but the whole country. No part of these United States presents greater advantages than does the country generally called the Pacific Coast. Harriman is piloting his ship along these lines, as well he may; he is a man of the present and future, he is also a man of opportunity. When these three accomplishments are added together it speaks volumes. The political uncertainties will soon be out of the way. Crops are now assured. There were 60,000 less idle cars last week than the previous week, and forty per cent less idle engines, all of which means something. There is nothing wrong with the country. Labor will soon find employment in abundance. Farmers are discarding their old methods of transportation and are riding in automobiles. Conditions are surely changing in the greatest country on earth, the one country generally called the Pacific Coast. Harriman is the rest of the world were fenced off. With these conditions in plain view there should be no lasting panics in our security markets. Indications point to a higher range of values for a long time to come. The political situation continues to indicate Taft's election by a larger vote than Roosevelt received. All talk to the contrary is misleading and mostly put out for the purpose of scaring the stay-at-home crowd. Taft's election means a big advance in all securities.

The True Story of the Elopement

With the advent of the Orville Pratts electrifying the immediate future, it might be interesting to give a revised and correct version of their romance. The story has gone through so many editions and has certainly been the "best seller" furnished by Burlingame during the silly season. But through them all have stalked more errors than printer's ink may be able to wash out of the the public mind at this late day. However, young Mrs. Pratt will herself probably take pains to contradict some of the errors in circulation. In the first place she did not enjoy a week's honeymoon, while supposedly visiting the Josselyns at their Woodside country home, as has so frequently been stated. The day that Miss Wilson and Mr. Pratt slipped away to Martinez to be married was the fete day of the child of the Vicomtesse de Tristan, and as Emily Wilson was the most cherished girlhood friend of Josephine de Guigne, she was bidden to the birthday party. Instead she slipped away to Martinez, arriving at the de Tristans when the birthday party was past tense, and dinner ready to be parsed. A convincing story of mishaps, delayed trains and limping automobiles explained her tardiness. After spending the night with the de Tristans she returned to her mother's home in the morning. When Mrs. Chase telephoned to Mrs. Cadwalader about the marriage notice Mrs. Cadwalader sent for her mother. Mrs. Wilson, greatly perturbed, summoned Mr. Pratt and in her daughter Emily's presence demanded to to know whether they had been married. Both simulated an amazement that would have been a credit to a dramatic school performance and Mrs. Wilson accepted the proffered theory that it was merely a coincidence. Mr. Pratt was not down at the depot when the Wilson party left for the East, but he joined them at Sacramento, went as far as Reno with them, and then journeyed back to join the Sierra Club on their outing.

The Romance Uncovered

When the bomb exploded Mr. Mountford Wilson sent a telegram to Mrs. Wilson in New York. But this telegram miscarried. Another telegram was sent and it brought results. The truth came out and then followed felicitations for, after all, everybody realized that it was an ideal match. There's no better fellow than Orville Pratt and why shouldn't he have a very charming wife. With everybody pleased it was decided to hunt for Mr. Pratt and when he was rounded out of the King's River canyon he was sent scurrying to New York to join his bride. The explanation given by the family for the procedure is that Miss Emily had a notion under her marcel wave that her mother would oppose her preference to Orville Pratt and she had kept their friendship as much under the rose as possible. So confirmed was she in the idea that her mother had taken an unreasonable dislike that the young couple decided to marry to insure their union against time, chance and parental interference. During the year of travel Emily was to win over her mother and the young couple planned to be married in the usual fashionable way at the end of a year.

Why Mrs. Wilson Was Puzzled

Close friends analyze Mrs. Wilson's attitude toward Orville Pratt as a result of the way the young couple conducted their courtship. Not having been informed that Emily was engaged Mrs. Wilson thought she was wasting time on a trifler when there were eligibles suing for her hand. It was a curious misunderstanding, but not psychologically impossible.

Burton, one of the interesting daughters of Inspector-General Burton, who was stationed here at the Presidio for many years. Mrs. Wells, then handsome, dashing Lelia Burton, went on the stage. Later she became a writer of some note and dropped these ambitions to marry Captain Wells. Minnie Burton, a sister, married Major Pierce, U. S. A. Kathro, another sister, is the wife of George Lee, son of General Fitzhugh LKee.

More Regrets Than Acceptances

Judging by the large number of regrets received by Mrs. Maurice Casey at her bridge party which took place on September 26th bridge is not going to be as popular this winter as formerly. Mrs. Casey sent out 110 invitations and received sixty-two regrets. As a consequence there were but twelve tables of players. When the butler appeared with his arms full of beautifully beribboned prizes there were "ohs" of delight, for Mrs. Casey and Mrs. Winship in times past have given elegant and expensive prizes. But this year Mrs. Casey is going in for the simple life and the prizes proved to be sad colored silk workbags. Every day more and more women say: "I hate big bridge parties." It is much more trouble and more expensive for the hostess, but the trend of smart entertaining is the small and dainty luncheon, and after it one or two, or at most three, tables of bridge. At these parties almost all the women play for money and sometimes quite large sums change hands.

High Play in the Country

At Mrs. Schwerin's recent bridge party one lady, Mrs. Russ Lukens, lost twenty-three dollars. Several others played in almost equally bad luck. But of course somebody was a winner.

Has Entered a Convent

The daughter of Dr. Hitchock, of San Rafael, who recently embraced the Catholic religion, has now entered the convent as a nun. Dr. Hitchcock is head of the Hitchcock Military Academy of San Rafael, a strict Episcopalian, and was at one time pastor of the Episcopal church there.

Here for the Wedding

Mrs. Frank Richardson Wells of Vermont is in San Francisco for the wedding of her younger sister, Florence, which was very quietly solemnized at the Bush home, Etnemere, in Fruitvale, on Wednesday of this week. Mrs. Wells is looking particularly stunning in her black gowns. The stork, taking advantage of the Hush family mourning which had withdrawn Mrs. Tom Magee from society, will call at the Magee home some time during November. When Richard Deane Magee was born to the Walter Magees some years ago, Mrs. Tom Magee was very much excited lest her younger sister-in-law should name the bady "Tom." "That is Tom's name and nobody else can have it," she said, but it is reported that she feels differently about a "Junior" now."

Under the Wedding Bells

About one hundred intimate friends gathered in the home of Mrs. W. E. Norwood in Green street last Monday evening to witness the wedding of her daughter, Miss Evelyn P. Norwood and William T. Breeze. Dr. Guthrie read the service. The drawing rooms were banked with great masses of American beauty roses and soft clusters of ferns. The bride wore an Empire gown of cream white satin, trimmed with point lace, and a long tulle veil fastened with a spray of orange blossoms. She carried a shower bouquet of lillies of the valley. Thomas Breeze, a brother of the bridegroom, was best man, but the bride was unattended. She was preceded down the broad stairway by four boys in sailor suits, who were the ribbon bearers. They were Tom Benson, a nephew of the bridegroom, Jack McKee, Burbank Somers and Charlie Crosby, children of the bride's cousins. A reception and wedding supper followed, after which the groom and bride departed on their honeymoon into the southland. On their return they will make their home in this city.

Ross Valley Engagement

The engagement is announced of Miss Gertrude Moore, daughter of Mrs. James Moore of Ross Valley, to Mr. Ord, a young Englishman connected with the firm of Balfour, Guthrie & Co. The late James Moore, father of the prospective bride, was one of the first residents of Ross Valley. She was born and has always lived in the house in which she will be married. She is noted as being what the artists in Europe call the American blonde, golden red hair and perfect complexion, a most unusual coloring. Mr. Ord is building a home in Ross Valley for his bride. The wedding will take place about the first of the year.

Says She Has Discovered the Culprit

A very smartly gowned young matron who recently lost some very valuable jewelry from her apartments, happened into a sociable gathering of her friends at an afternoon tea the other day. The conversation finally drifted to handsome engagement rings, when the young matron suddenly exclaimed: "You remember that jewelry that was stolen from me?" The interested chorus answered, "Yes." "Well, I've found the culprit." A babel of voices demanded the name. It was given unhesitatingly and shocked surprise ran around the group. The young matron was cautioned that it was a bold statement to make, but she defended herself by declaring that the detectives working on the case would hand in their final report in a few days and substantiate what she had said. Despite this endorsement many of those present thought the young matron would soon repent her hasty words.

The Wedding Day Set

The wedding of Mrs. Linda Bryan and Mr. Prentis Cobb Hale has been definitely set for Thursday, October 1st, at four o'clock, in St. Stephen's church. Reverend Cecil Marrack will officiate. Expectant friends will be sadly disappointed to learn that only a few of the immediate members of the family will be present. The bride will wear a very handsome imported costume of shaded green bengaline silk, her hat will be a creation of deep cream lace, trimmed with cloth of gold, and four drooping willow feathers of deep cream. After the ceremony the bridal couple will leave immediately on a motor tour through the south, stopping at Del Monte, Santa Barbara and Coronado, a roving trip that will last about three weeks. On their return they will reside in the present home of Mrs. Bryan in Buchanan street till such time as Mr. Hale finds a suitable home to purchase.

Passing of An Early Day Belle

Mrs. Elizabeth Ford, who died in Berkeley last week, celebrated her ninety-fourth birthday at the residence of her granddaugter, Mrs. Bessie Riddel, only recently. Mrs. Ford was very prominent in pioneer society. She was the wife of the late Jeremiah Ford of Baltimore and the mother of the late Mrs. Joseph Tilden. Her husband, Joseph Tilden, was a prominent clubman and was burned to death in Honolulu several years ago. Mrs. Ford was one of the three Reeves sisters of Philadelphia, all of whom became mothers of people well known in local society. Elizabeth became Mrs. Ford; Caroline married Mr. Allan Cadwalader, the father of Mrs. Robert N. Graves, while Frances became Mrs. Mrs. Alfred Slade, the mother of Mrs. William Mayo Newhall.

lifted in their cause. He has a clever knack at interesting the ladies and not long ago a well known matron of established position, who was introduced to him after a lecture, invited him to dinner. Before the roast was ordered she discovered that he had a partner to his joys and sorrows, and so she wrote a graceful little note of apology for not including the wife. On its heels came a note from the ready Englishman saying that his wife was so busy, so crowded with her domestic cares that she never went about socially and he would come alone to the dinner, etcetera. The next day the lady chanced to meet the young Englishman. "Do you really mean that your wife can never accept any invitation?" she demanded, and upon an affirmative answer she replied with some asperity, "Then I shall have to withdraw the invitation to you also."

A Pricking Interrogation

There is no doubt that the Suffragists have added a dynamic force to their ranks in the conversion of this powerful young orator. But this painful interrogation pricks the enthusiasm of a mere onlooker. If he helps to gain the ballot for women will his own wife have to forego breakfast in order to vote, and still attended to her "crowded domestic cares"?

Sunday Teas at the Sequoia Club

The Sequoia Club has inaugurated a series of Sunday afternoon teas, to take place on the last Sunday of each month. The first occurred on Sunday, September 27th. The afternoon was made very entertaining by vocal and instrumental selections rendered by club members. Among those contributing were Mrs. Carrie Dexter Kling, Miss Rene Bird, and Miss Josephine Blanche. The hostesses for the afternoon were Mrs. Ramon Wilson, Mrs. Martin Regensberger and Mrs. R. V. Whiting.

Miss Alexander's Debut

The Mountford Wilsons have rented their handsome home in Pacific avenue to some eastern people, and have taken apartments at the Hillcrest. The debut tea to be given to their niece, Miss Harriett Alexander, will take place in the Wilson home October 10th. Miss Elizabeth Woods, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Robert J. Woods, will also make her debut on the same occasion. Miss Woods is an only child. Her mother will be remembered as Miss Mattie Peters, one or the early day society girls. Mrs. Woods is a niece of Mrs. Schmiedell and sister of Charles Rollo Peters, the well known artist.

Rodin and the Ambitious American Woman

A story of the great French sculptor Rodin and a woman client is going the rounds in Paris. A wealthy American woman who wished to transmit her form to posterity called on the artist and commissioned him to execute a life-size statue of herself. The lady possessed a well turned figure and for hours, draped in Greek robes, she posed before the sculptor. After a dozen visits Rodin told her that further sittings were unnecessary and that he would finish the statue at his leisure. But when the fair American returned some time later to take possession of her portrait she was astonished to observe that the head of the statue bore no resemblance to her own. She was naturally very indignant and complained bitterly of the lack of resemblance. "Yes, you are quite right," replied the veteran sculptor in a dreamy, far away voice. "The fact is that your head was entirely lacking in inspiration, and at first I thought of leaving the statue without a head. But after reflection and in order that you might suffer no prejudice I preferred to replace your head by that of Mme. de N., which she once ordered from me and has never paid for. Besides, you will lose nothing by the change."

Rehearsals at Del Monte

My Monterey correspondent writes that preparations for the performance of "As You Like It" under the spreading oaks of Del Monte are progressing finely. Frank Mathieu, under whose direction the play is to be produced, came down on Saturday bringing with him other members of the cast, including Emerson Warfield, Walter H. Robinson, Alan Dunn, H. M. In the Social Spotlight

Mrs. Walter Martin, Miss Jennie Crocker, and Templeton Crocker have returned to San Mateo after an enjoyable trip to the McCloud River country.

Much sympathy is felt for Mrs. Marguerite Hanford, who has been suddenly called to Canada in response to a telegram announcing the illness of her mother.

Mrs. George Wells and her daughter, Mrs. Selby Hanna, who are at present visiting in Chicago as the guests of Mrs. Charles Huse, nee Wells, will return to San Francisco during the middle of October.

Mrs. J. O. B. Gunn left for the East during the week expecting to be gone several months.

Mrs. Charles O. Alexander, to whom society is indebted for the smart Colonial dances to be held this season, will spend the winter at the Hotel St. Francis with her son and daughter.

Mrs. Thomas R. Hayes and Mrs. Fulton Berry have taken rooms at the Hotel Stewart.

Dr. and Mrs. John Grissim and family have returned from a long residence in Tonopah and have taken rooms at Park Inn, Oakland. Mrs. Grissim was formerly pretty Irene Baker, a sister of Cleve Baker, the well-known attorney.

Mrs. Frederick Tallant, who has been visiting in the East for the past three months, will return about October 1st. It is not unlikely that she will be accompanied by her pretty niece, Miss Eloise Tallant, who has been abroad for the past two years.

Dr. Arnold Genthe will return from his trip to Japan about October 8th.

Dr. Howard S. Taylor and John Temple Graves, Independence League candidate for the Vice-Presidency, are at the St. Francis.

Mrs. Edward Barron has taken apartments at the Fairmont for the winter. Miss Barron left for the East this week on a short visit.

Mrs. Frank Norris is in Santa Barbara, the guest of Mrs. Robert Louis Stevenson.

Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Fox of Sacramento are at the St. Francis for a short stay.

Colonel Lucas and Mrs. Lucas, of London, England, are at the Fairmont.

Mrs. William G. Irwin and Miss Helena Irwin are now in Paris and will sail for home about the middle of October.

Mrs. C. H. Mann entertained eight ladies at luncheon in the St. Francis Saturday, after which bridge was enjoyed in the green room.

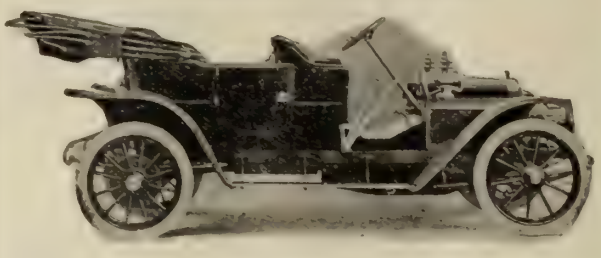
Rear Admiral W. T. Burrell and Mrs. Burrell, U. S. N., have been at the Fairmont for the past few days. Admiral Burrell has had command in the Northwest at Bremerton Navy Yard for some time past. Among the other army and navy arrivals at the Fairmont are Lieutenant Haynes Ellis and Mrs. Ellis and Dr. Reginald B. Henry, U. S. N.

The patronesses of the Colonial dances were entertained informally at luncheon in the Hotel St. Francis last Friday by Mrs. Henry T. Scott.

Mrs. Charles W. Clarke, accompanied by her brother, Richard Tobin, will arrive home from Europe in October.

Mrs. Mary Huntington and her daughters, Mrs. Gilbert Brooke Perkins and Miss Marion Huntington, who have been abroad for the past six months, sailed for home on October 1st.

Mrs. William Cary Van Fleet has issued cards for a dancing party which will take place in the California Club room, Friday evening, October 9th. The invitations include the younger members of society still in their early teens.



Mr. and Mrs. Frank Fuller of Ross Valley recently celebrated their tin wedding anniversary.

Miss Linda Cadwalader, who has been the guest of Mrs. Henry Scott for several weeks, will return to the city this week and spend the balance of the winter with Mr. and Mrs. George Cadwalader in Devisadero street.

Among the arrivals at Byron Hot Springs from San Francisco during the past week were: Fillmore White, Mr. and Mrs. O. H. Smyth, Miss Valerie Smyth, Mrs. James Shea, John Baker, Jr., D. C. Dinan and John R. Sheehan. From Oakland: Dr. John Fearn, Mr. and Mrs. J. C. Fossings and Miss Hazel Fossing. From Berkeley: J. W. Havens and Frank M. Wilson.

Dr. James Keeney has purchased the Wilshire house in Buchanan street and will soon move his family into their new home.

Vaudeville Tea Nearly Ready

A vaudeville tea for the benefit fund of the Albert Sidney Johnson Chapter, No. 79, N. D. G. W., will take place on Saturday afternoon, October 24th, at the St. Francis Hotel. Besides tea, music and the contributions of talent of various kinds there will be a number of original vaudeville novelties. Among the ladies taking an active interest in the affair are Mrs. Selden S. Wright, Mrs. Eleanor Martin, Miss Carrie Gwin, Mrs. Patrick Calhoun, Mrs. J. de Barth Shorb, Mrs. William Pritchard, Mrs. Louis Aldrich and others prominent in society. Many of the season's debutantes will be in the tea room presiding over the tables.

Entertainments at Pacific Grove

The banquet hall of Pacific Grove Hotel was the scene of a delightful affair last Sunday evening, when Mr. and Mrs. Rolla V. Watt celebrated their twenty-fifth wedding anniversary with a dinner at which they entertained twenty-seven guests. The decorations were exceedingly pretty and appropriate to the occasion. The guests included: Dr. and Mrs. Dille, Mrs. L. J. Watt, Dr. S. D. Hutsinpillar, Mr. and Mrs. S. D. Martin, Dr. W. W. Case, Mr. and Mrs. J. L. Case, Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Humphreys, Mrs. C. E. Johnson, Dr. and Mrs. Gordon Hamilton, Mr. and Mrs. Lombard, Mr. and Mrs. Stanley Webster, Mr. and Mrs. J. H. McCullough and Mrs. Calbreath. Among the interesting affairs given at Pacific Grove during the week were the card party on Monday at which Miss Sarah Parke was hostess and the dinner given by Mr. and Mrs. John P. Pryor, the same day, complimentary to Captain and Mrs. Edward M. Lewis of the Presidio of Monterey, who departed on Thursday for Berkeley, where Captain Lewis has been appointed military instructor at the University of California. Miss Mary Greet, whose niece, Miss Mary Bennett, was recently married to Franklin Lieb of San Jose, has returned to the Grove and expects to make it her permanent home. Miss Constance Borrowe was in the Grove last week and had as her guest Mrs. Gaston Ashe.

Stage

The Rival "Devils"

In the light of legend, history and the tales told in the ancient tomes of Alexandria, the Devil as portrayed at the Valencia and Novelty theatres this week couldn't find a billet anywhere unless in a play planned to succeed as a catchpenny "freak" on the modern stage. He would be kicked out of any clean minded, wholesome society without a moment's hesitation. Only in a gathering of the ebullient Newport variety, with its monkey dinners and champagne baths, as depicted in the yellow press, could he find tolerant lodgment. There is nothing of the old-time red-fire and brimstone about him, nothing malignant, powerful, cruel; no clap-trap thunder and heroics; he enters the play in the guise of a well-groomed gentleman, smiling, affable, gracious, suggestive in his insinuating kindness, superserviceable in his anxiety to assist. He has a ready panacea for all desires, base desires—gratification. He represents the incarnation of sensual appetites, just as Manson, in "The Servant in the House" is the embodyment of the Christian spirit of higher endeavor. This spirit in the latter play awakened the nobler sentiments and impulses in the principals while in "The Devil" the tempter stimulates the wrongful love of his victims into debasing passions. The Hungarian author has conceived his play with judgment and has developed it with clever ingenuity. At the precise moment when it is apparent that clutching temptation is before the amatory young couple, the arch tempter appears inexplicably, and is received almost as if he was expected. Thereafter he personifies the imp of desire that really exists in their own minds, the ever ready little pandar within that furnishes the alluring arguments to whet their appetites and justify their courses in yielding to every mad impulse of illicit love. Unlike the writers who have handled this old theme in masterly fashion author Molnar presents no redeeming feature in the action of his play. He portrays the drifting lustful course of two weak, impulsive, dazed human beings to the sodden end. They hardly offer a show of feeble resistence. It is only too evident that they are completely hypnotized by the arguments of their own weak, indulgent minds, as voiced by the plausible and insinuating devil in the cast. He is everlastingly at their elbows to serve them; he never quits them from the moment their passion awakens till he closes the door behind them as they leave the scene in each other's arms. No awakening conscience summoning the invertebrate will of either individual intervenes to oppose the tempter and for this reason the action trails in the muck and grovels in the mire till the final curtain. Its moral effect is nasty. Its life will be measured by the cheap curiosity of the public. Zola might have used similar prurient effects but he would have given them a twist to arouse repugnance in the mind of the ordinary observer and drive home the lesson of disgust for such passions. Molnar has taken the Salome view of the stage as it is today and has written with his eye on the box office receipts. To this end he has introduced a number of lickerish situations evidently worked up for the butterfly minded. When he was sober old Macready used to conceive his Satanic majesty as a damnable fellow; when he was otherwise he portrayed him as a devil of a fellow, which, in a way, goes to show that the condition of the mind of the player cuts a figure in his conception of the part. The four actors playing the role of "The Devil" in the East and in the West today, Arliss, Stevens, Warwick and Hickman, are all portraying the character according to their individual ideas, Like all the incarnations of Good and Evil the role is capable of great flexibility and much fine coloring. Warwick at the Valencia Theatre conceives it on broad and bold lines. In voicing the minds of the puppet lovers, he is deeply sincere in his arguments urging them to seek the gratification of their desires. There is even a touch of camaraderie in his manner that makes him always welcome and paves the way for his insinuating sophistries. At critical moments he shows touches of latent power that gives a glimpse of the Satanic. Underlying his portrayal is force, the superior will of the demon; his frock coat and elegant ways are only a cloak. Hickman's rendition at the Novelty is of a lighter order. He represents the suave Mephistolelian type thoroughly enjoying the game of baiting hesitating sinners. He is finely suggestive, subtle, always smiling at his own sophistries but keenly alive to their appetizing influence on the hungry minds of his victims. He watches their abandonment to pleasure with all the enjoyment of a philanthropist wrapt in the delight of doing a good deed. The other roles in the two casts are colored to a great extent by the personalities of the players. Louise Brownell as the wayward wife was cast in a part unlike any of her old time roles and scored a distinct advance. Miss Willette Kershaw at the Valencia played the part in a pretty, melting fashion. Glendenning at the Novelty and von Meter at the Valencia failed to make the most of the passionate lines of the artist lover. Bessie Barriscale portrayed all there was in the thankless part of the jilted fiancee, while Blanche Douglass of the Valencia made a satisfactory showing. There was little to choose between Miss Effie Bond and Miss Neva West in the role of the artist's model, the only sympathetic part in the play. Both productions were handsomely staged.

Musical Comedy at the Van Ness

The Time—About three hours.
The Place—Van Ness Theatre.
The Girl—Any one of the fifty.

Another collection of happy zephyrs from the shores of Lake Michigan, bottled expressly for "Johnnie" Young and a bevy of pretty chorus girls, arrived at the Van Ness Theatre on Monday evening and opened a week's engagement. They are labelled "The Time, The Place and The Girl," and Chicago took 463 spoonfuls before entrusting them to the tender mercies of "the road." Musical comedies, if not exceptionally clever or unique, are apt to pall a trifle and send some of the blase theatregoers away before the final act. There isn't a dull moment in the Hough-Adams potpourri, and no one left the Van Ness on Monday evening until the energetic ballet waved an adieu with their little golden feet. "The T. P. and G." company evidently enjoy their work, for they infuse into it a piquancy and dash which is really delightful. The chorus is one of the best drilled that has come to us this season, with the additional virtues of feature, form and clever costuming. The plot, which is properly consigned to musical obscurity in most places, is still tangible enough to be interesting, especially in a few semi-dramatic sections where some real acting is done. John E. Young, in the principal male role, has the burden of responsibility upon his shoulders—but you would never know it His vocabulary of Americanisms is startling, and as "Johnnie" would express it, "brings tears to a pair of glass eyes." Lillian Goldsmith, as "The Girl," is a dainty and wonderful little dancer, with a fair voice. Elizabeth Goodall and Mabel Melvine are well cast, and Theodore Rook does a clever bit of character work. The company works well together and provides a welcome relief for ennui.

Warfield in "A Grand Army Man"

"A Grand Army Man," in which David Warfield is said to have achieved his greatest artistic distinction, will be acted by the eminent player and the Belasco company all next week, beginning Monday night, and concluding Mr. Warfield's engagement in this city. The sale of seats has been very large. There will be two matinees—Thursday and Saturday. David Belasco selected "A Grand Army Man" as the play for his star to dedicate his beautiful New York playhouse, the Stuyvesant. It ran in New York all last season. It is the joint work of David Belasco, Pauline Phelps and Marion Short. From a technical standpoint "A Grand Army Man" has been proclaimed a superior play to "The Music Master." Indeed, with the genuine poetry that Mr. Belasco has woven into the structure and breathed into its "atmosphere," the little play in the hands of Warfield becomes a classic. In it David Warfield has shown powers that he has never revealed before, and while the comedy is as quaint and as plentiful as it is in "The Music Master" the tragedy of life is keener. The actor's graceful methods of comedy and gentle pathos prevail, and in one act he strikes the true note of real, human tragedy—tragedy that is expressed by the tortured soul of the player instead of the blank verse of the author. Mr. Belasco sends with Mr. Warfield the company that is the same in almost every character that supported him in the New York cast. The prominent members of the cast include Marie Bates, Veda McEvers, Isabel Waldron, Antoinette Perry, Ruth Gates, William Elliott, Taylor Holmes, Stephen Maley, William Beag, Oscar Eagle, George Woodward, Harold Mead and John V. Dailey.

Still Playing "The Devil"

So great has been the success of Belasco and Mayer's presentation of "The Devil" in the Novelty Theatre that a second week of the sensational play has been decided upon, commencing next Monday evening and concluding with the Saturday night performance. Howard Hickman's acting in the title role has proved a revelation of talent backed by intelligence, and all the other people in the cast are admirably fitted. So great is the demand to see the play at the Novelty that it could be profitable retained there a third week if the opening of the Alcazar regular stock season did not necessitate the company's removal to the Sutter street theatre, October 11th. Miss Evelyn Vaughan, who comes from the East recommended as a beautiful woman and an able actress, will play leading parts opposite Bertram Lytell during the coming season at the Alcazar, and will make her first appearance there in "The Hypocrites," a domestic drama by Henry Arthur Jones that has never been presented west of Chicago.

"The Devil" Continues at the Valencia

Owing to the enormous interest manifested in Molnar's celebrated play, "The Devil," and the fact that the Valencia Theatre has been packed to the doors at every performance this week, the management announces that "The Devil" will be presented for a second week, beginning Sunday, October 4th. Not in a long while has any play offered in San Francisco aroused such a discussion as this remarkable offering. Robert Warwick has won a great success in the title role at the Valencia Theatre, and has immeasurably advanced his standing as an actor of the first rank. This has been the great opportunity Warwick needed in his home city, and he has taken full advantage in portraying this wonderful role. His performance alone raises the Valencia production to the highest possible standard of excellence; but in addition to this he is supported by a strong company, in which Miss Willette Kershaw as the wife wins new honors for her fine, delicate handling of a difficult role. "The Devil" will positively be withdrawn after next week's performance, in order to make way a week later, most appropriately, for a gigantic production of "The Sign of the Cross."

Novelties at the Orpheum

The program for the Orpheum next week will maintain in every respect the high standard for which this theatre is famous. The Cadets de Gascogne, who will make their first appearance in this city, is one of the best and most popular quartettes in Europe. The quartette consists of one female singer and three male vocalists, all of whom wear the picturesque costume of Normandy. The Saytons, who are also new to us, have been specially brought from Europe. The press of the old world enthusiastically acclaimed them as a distinct innovation in the contortion line. They appear as alligators in the depths of a tropical forest and indulge in contortions which are wonderful. "General" Edward La Vine, who styles himself "a man who has soldiered all his life," and is an old army veteran, will introduce a remarkable and original juggling act. The performance of Belle Hathaway's "Simian Playmates," as her monkeys and baboons are called, will appeal to both old and young children. Miss Hathaway has given her pets an education that is nothing short of phenomenal. Next week will be the last of Hillarion and Rosalia Ceballos' Phantastic Phantoms, Vinie Daly, the Swor Brothers and of Jane Courthope & Company in the romance of the Sierras, "Lucky Jim." A new series of motion pictures will prove a pleasing finish to a delightful entertainment.

"Ship Ahoy" at the Princess

Of the many musical comedy successes that have been given in this city none have achieved a greater popularity than "Ship Ahoy" and its revival at the Princess Theatre next Monday night should result in extraordinary success, especially as it will reintroduce Ferris Hartman in the role of Colonel Mapleson Mulberry, manager of the Oriole Opera Company. "Ship Ahoy" has been brought thoroughly up to date. Its story has been retained, but all the musical numbers will be entirely new and very appropriate. Colonel Mapleson Mulberry starts out with his opera company to play the East Indies, but his ship is wrecked on the Island of Palms, where they are compelled to eke out a precarious existence for a year and a day, when they are rescued by the United States warship "Cuckoo." On the homeward voyage Colonel Mulberry attempts to run the ship and it is in this act that Mr. Hartman gets full scope for the display of his great comic ability. A cast which will challenge comparison with all previous presentations of this musical play has been selected. Arthur Cunningham will appear as Barnacle Duff, master at arms, and Fred Kavanagh, who played Christy, the property man, in the Tivoli production, will have the same character again. Sybil Page will have a fine chance to excel as Mlle. Auburni Erani, an American prima donna; Zoe Barnett as Madame Lulu Lalla, a disappointed musical genius, will have one of the best singing soubrette roles ever written. Sarah Edwards is most happily cast as Mlle. Georgia Carolini from the Grand Opera House, Paris (Kentucky), and

Mme. Blanche Arral to Sing at the Van Ness

Manager Will Greenbaum believes he has discovered another world-wonder in music. This time it is Mme. Blanche Arral, a Belgian singer who has been prima donna at the Imperial Opera in St. Petersburg, the Theatre Monnaie in Brussels and the Opera Comique in Paris. Mme. Arral has just finished a tour in Asia and Australia and was passing through the city en route to London without any intention of appearing in public. Mr. Greenbaum received letters from correspondents in Australia advising him to secure her for several concerts. After hearing madame sing Mr. Greenbaum immediately engaged her. The concert will be given at the Van Ness Theatre, Sunday afternoon, October 11, assisted by a grand orchestra of thirty-five instruments under Paul Steindorff. Mme. Arral will be heard in such number as the "Mad Scene" from Hamlet, "Bell Song," from "Lakme," "Polacca" from "Mignon," besides songs from the Spanish, Russian, German and English. San Francisco discovered Tettrazini, Adele Verne and others and perhaps Mme. Arral will prove another musical wonder. Seats will be ready Thursday, October 8th, at Sherman, Clay & Co's, both stores.

Sunday Afternoon Song Recital

The Half Hour of Music in the Greek Theatre next Sunday afternoon will be a song recital by the well-known blind soprano, Miss Gussie Mast, at present teacher of music in the Institute for the Deaf and Dumb and the Blind, from which she graduated several years ago. Miss Mast possesses a beautiful lyric soprano voice. Her program will be as follows: Sumner, Chaminade; Fruhlingsnacht, Schumann; La Gazza Ladra, Oh How eats My Heart with Joy, Rossini; Lovely Spring, Coenen; Chanson Provencale, E. Dell 'Aqua; The Lord is My Light, Frances Allitsen. Miss Mast's accompanist will be Miss Edith W. Allen, who graduated from the University in the class of 1900.

Second Concert at Greek Theatre

It seems that the longer Paul Steindorff stays with us the more popular he becomes. Last Saturday night, when he gave the first of his orchestral concerts in the Greek Theatre, Berkeley, there were more than four thousand people in the big open-air auditorium among the eucalypti. It was a fine tribute to his ability as a director. The enthusiam was indicated in the generous applause that was tendered the efforts of the orchestra of select instrumentalists gathered and trained by Steindorff for the present series. The solist of the evening was Miss Lydia Sturtevant, a former member of the Royal Opera Company and the contralto who sang one of the leading roles with the Milan Opera Company shortly after the big fire. Miss Sturtevant is a Berkeley girl and is at present living in the college town. This was her first public appearance in some time, although the concert managers had made many attempts to have her sing before. She scored decidedly with the first aria from Trovatore and her singing of Annie Laurie evoked a demonstration that forced her to respond with a rendition of La Paloma. The next concert will be given on the evening of October 3rd. It will begin at 8 o'clock and will be over at 10. A splendid program has been arranged by Steindorff. The soloist will be announced later.

The Lloyd Scott "Travel Talks"

Next Monday night at Christian Science Hall Manager Will Greenbaum will introduce the "Lloyd Scott Travel Talks" which he expects to make an annual event in this city, just as the Burton Holmes Travellogues are given in New York, Boston and other cities as regularly as the opera season. Mr. Scott is a man of scholarly attainments, a splendid speaker; the equipments of projecting machines, lanterns, etc., are the finest that can be manufactured and the views number over one thousand hand-colored lantern slides, dozens of colored panoramic effects, including snow scenes, moonlight and other illusions and thousands of feet of moving pictures. One may expect a most interesting and entertaining series of "travels in an opera chair." Each subject will be given twice; for Monday and Tuesday nights, October 5th and 6th, "India" has been selected; Thursday and Friday will be devoted to "Japan" and Saturday night to "Russia." There will be no Wednesday evening entertainment, but on Saturday afternoon "Japan" will be repeated for the benefit of school children, for whom half prices will be charged. The second week will be divided as follows: Monday night, "Russia"; Tuesday and Thursday, "Egypt," and Friday and Saturday, "Ireland." Box offices are open at both of Sherman, Clay and Company's stores. A season in Oakland will open Monday, October 19th, at Maple Hall, corner Fourteenth and Webster streets.

New Series of Minetti Concerts

The Minetti String Quartet are going to give another set of their delightful programs. They announce the sixteenth series of their chamber music concerts to take place in Century Hall, November 6th, 20th and December 4th. Notices of subscriptions are being sent in to them in most encouraging numbers, which assures success for the series.

The Coming Maclean-Etlin Concert

The concert of Donald Maclean and Henri Etlin to take place at Christian Science Hall, Saturday evening, October 3rd, is attracting much interest in musical circles, owing both to the novelty and to the excellence of the program.

In the Limelight

"The Time, The Place and The Girl" will remain the alluring attraction for a second and last week at the Van Ness. John E. Young, Elizabeth Goodall and the other forty or more principals and chorus contrive to make the musical play one of the liveliest, snappiest entertainments offered here in months. In consequence the engagement promises to be a record-breaker in point of attendance. There will be Sunday night performances. Matinees are given on Saturdays only.

Those who have seen Dustin Farnum in the star role of "The Virginian" will certainly want to attend the forthcoming performances at the Van Ness Theatre of "The Squaw Man." Farnum comes here direct from his latest eastern triumps in this splendid play, surrounded by one of the best groups of players brought together this season. Seats go on sale Thursday.

At the Beatrice Fine-Anna Miller Wood concert to be given on the 22d inst. no less than twelve songs will be heard for the first time in this city.

In the Toledo three-days reliability run, Toledo, Columbus, Cleveland, Toledo, a distance of about six hundred miles, seventeen cars were entered. Fifteen of these in class A and two in class B. Six cars in class A made perfect scores. One of these, a White 30, the only White entered, made by far the most perfect run of the contest, absolutely no adjustments whatever being made, and the car finishing in perfect condition in every respect, which was in marked contrast to the condition of some of the other cars, which were allowed perfect scores.

Come forward the actors with claims to be heard in this controversy, and their claims are of no recent date. Some of the greatest that ever trod the stage have affirmed that the inspired player is independent of the poet, because the supreme essence of feeling does not reside in prose or in verse, but in the accent with which it is delivered. No less an authority than the Professor of Literature at Columbia, the author of a successful melodrama, regards this statement as by no means a specimen of professional vanity. A striking story in support of this plea was recounted by the great Italian tragedian Erneste Rossi. With a number of his fellows he was one day dining in a restaurant in Padua, when the conversation drifted to the possibilities of their art. One of them picked up the bill of fare and declared he could read the monotonous list so feelingly as to bring tears to their eyes. The others, hardened to every trick of their trade, scoffed at his proposal. But the boaster was a better artist and knew the tricks of his trade better than they. At first he spoke simply, gradually rounding his full tones in a dignity of utterance that concealed the commonplace syllables. Then his rich, full baritone voice began to tremble as he ran the gamut of emotional tones, till poignant agony was reached and—the tears of those at the table began to flow. Madam Modjeska was just as successful on another notable occasion. though her auditors were not cognizant of the trick played upon them. At a big social function in New York one afternoon, a group of enthusiastic ladies demanded that she recite something in Polish. She demurred for a time, but being persistently pressed, she consented. The composition she repeated was strangely rythmic, but the syllables gradually became lost as the full rounded tones of the Polish actress swept into a deeper emotional strain. Before she finished her audience was in tears. A compatriot, however, was forced to leave the room to hide his merriment. Mme. Mojeska had simply repeated the multiplication table in the Polish language.

Auto Notes

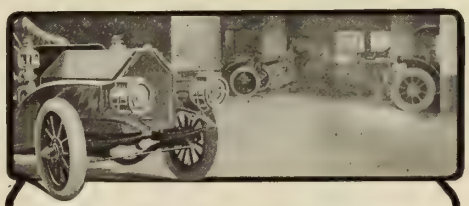
The showing made by the six-cylinder 40 h. p. Thomas car, in the recent twenty-four-hour race meet at Brighton Beach, was a surprise to the maker and created a great deal of favorabel comment around the track. The fact that the car was a new machine and was rushed to the track from the factory without any preliminary testing or tuning, and even then run close to the former world's record, demonstrated to the satisfaction of the Thomas factory as to the durability and speed of the new Thomas.

The city of Columbia, South Carolina, had its first automobile race-meet on Labor Day. The races were held on the mile track at the fair grounds and over 2000 people were present, testifying to the keen interest in automobiling in that section. The principal event, the 25-mile free-for-all for the Board of Trade cup, was won by a 30 h. p. White steamer, driven by R. D. Lambert, his time being 30 minutes and 30 seconds.

The Howard Automobile Company has shipped a Buick "White Streak" to Fresno, where it is entered in the race meet to be held Monday next, the opening day of the Fresno County Fair. Frank X. Murray will go to Fresno Saturday night to drive the car in the race.

An interesting trip of over two thousand miles has just been completed by S. O. Johnson, the well known motorist and prominent lumber dealer of this city. Johnson, accompanied by his wife and chauffeur, traveled in their 60 h. p. Thomas car from this city through the northern part of the State, up through southern and eastern Oregon to the Dalles, then to Portland, and returned via Salem, Roseburg and Grant's Pass. The party was on the road five weeks.

Word was received yester by E. P. Brinegar, of the Pioneer Automobile Company, that the Chalmers-Detroit 30, which is being given a 200 mile per day test, has entered the fifth week of the test and is running fine. Over six thousand miles have been covered by the car to date.



The White "Pathfinder" returned last night from a 400-mile swing around the heart of the State. The big seven-passenger White steamer was driven by William Slimmon, the well-known stunt driver. The passengers were W. Russell Cole, W. H. B. Fowler, Burleigh Davison, Harry Davids, B. D. Johnson and B. S. Allen. With the view of finding a suitable course for the second cruise of the northern division of the "White Squadron," the roads of Central California were closely studied. In the San Joaquin and Sacramento valleys it was found that the highways have been badly cut up by the heavy grain wagons. In Napa and Sonoma counties the roads were found to be generally good. The levee road from Sacramento to Woodland is practically impassable for all except the most powerful cars. The White steamer made without difficulty one sandy stretch that has turned back twenty cars during the past week.

The Franklin automobile is the first in America to adopt the magneto ignition system without auxiliary batteries, this being the regular 1909 equipment. The system eliminates the coil box, making possible an unencumbered and much neater dash. The use of the magneto only is the method adopted by several of the leading foreign makers and will undoubtedly be taken up very rapidly in America. As a test of this system the perfect score Franklin automobiles in the Glidden tour were so equipped and covered the entire trip without even adjusting.

Henry C. Finkler, secretary of the Supreme Court of the State of California, has purchased from the Howard Automobile Company a Buick "White Streak."

C. J. Uhl of Vacaville was in town Wednesday in his two cylinder Buick touring car. He followed the State trotting circuit in his car to witness the performance of his phenomenal young pacer, Solano Boy. The horse finished second in both his starts in this State and won his first start at Salem, Oregon.

One of the most remarkable mileage records ever claimed for an automobile is recorded by S. G. Chapman of the Consolidated Motor Car Company. Over in Oakland there is an old 1905 model D Franklin touring car, 20 h. p., which is owned by Taylor lb Co., lumber merchants. The record claimed for the car is 47,970 miles, and it is further stated by the owners of the car that the motor has never been overhauled or needed repair until this week, when it was found necessary to secure four new piston rings. The car has been handled by the same man all the time, and his great care and the general reliability of the car are give nas the factors making possible this great feat.

Putting the Car in Commission

When you put your car "in commission," you want it to "stay put." Good lubrication is almost the first requirement. Avoidance of carbon deposits is of prime necessity. Both are accomplished by the use of ZEROLENE, the new friction-proof, trouble proof, carbon-proof oil. Your spark plug troubles will cease—you can forget all about them if you use Zerolene. This oil is produced in only one place in the world.

ZEROLENE

Auto-Lubricating Oil

is made in only one grade. This one grade works perfectly in every type of gasoline engine. Leaves practically no carbon deposit, and keeps cylinders and spark plugs clean.

Sealed cans with non-refilling spout protect against substitution of inferior oils. Also put up in barrels for garage trade. Sold by dealers everywhere.

Extols "Made" Matches

In writing "Aunt Maud," Ernest Oldmeadows had a decided purpose, that of extolling the virtues of the judicious match maker and the advantages of the "made" match over those of the romantic love type. Aunt Maud, young, rich and desirable, but unmarried, had a beautiful, bewitching but poor niece. She also had a distant relative, six years older than the young lady, who, along with all the other perfections and advantages, had both wealth and position, for Richard Camber was the governor of some vague colony where Dutch traders, Indians, tropical climate and buffalo were inextricably mixed, and where English society was a minus quantity. Richar Camber was on his triennial vacation to England and he and his niece Irene, were invited to spend a month with Aunt Maud, who took niece Irene into her confidence and frankly explained her intentions and designs. Niece Irene just as promptly took Richard Camber into her own confidence. Two days after his arrival she invited him to a conference and in slang phrase, "gave away Aunt Maud," but proposed that they two should play at being engaged during the period of their visit, and at the end of the month, if either wished to withdraw, they would simply announce the termination of their agreement. Meanwhile there was to be no sentimentalizing. Aunt Maud took frequent occasion to remonstrate with her niece on the subject of her coolness and lack of appreciation of her lover, while that young lady, at first determined to wait for the ideal match, immediately proceeds to fall in love with the man at hand and to have sentimental fevers lest, after all, he should prefer some other. Meanwhile, there is provided the "awful example" in the shape of another engaged couple invited for a visit at the same time. Fanny Bates did her own match making. She "fell in love" with Norman Hastings, apparently greatly to the surprise of that overgrown baby and the indignation of his mama. Fanny is a very awful example, indeed, of a girl in love, and poor Norman is sufficiently henpecked in advance to make him seize upon any pretext of escape. Niece Irene's jealousy is aroused when she discovers that Fanny has an eye on the desirable Gamber, and foolish Norman, tired of the naggings of his fiance, tries to serve her out by proposing for Irene, all of which goes to show that wise maids will heed the advice of worldly-wise aunts and take what is provided for them without any waste of time and heroics. One really wonders what a man would think of a girl who, two days after meeting him, would be so forethoughful as to assure him that she wasn't going to marry him. "Aunt Maud" will not do any special harm. It is about as substantial as chocolate fudge and though it will not prove a substitute for a square meal, will, perhaps, satisfy a temporary craving which might otherwise be stilled by something worse. Laura Jane's Retirement

Here's good news for the budding geniuses whose masterpieces have been sidetracked by inappreciative publishers in order that the inferior products of those who have acquired Names may claim right of way. Laura Jean Libbey is to retire from the field. Positively her last appearance is authoritatively announced. No more will she chronicle the heart-throbs of Queenie and Howard. No longer will the beautiful sales girl flee and the false villain pursue. No more will the mysterious midnight marriage and the years of weepful woes prelude the triumphal entry to the ducal demesne. Laura Jean will write no more. Hear her: "I have been tremendously successful as a novelist that I should be willing to stand back now and give others a chance. If we who have been so successful should continue to write all our lives, how could others get their work before the public?" How indeed? Here's a point to be pondered by Maurice Hewlett and Eden Phillpotts, by Mrs. Humphrey Ward, Mrs. Wharton and Gertrude Atherton. Let Richard Harding Davis, Jack London and John Fox, Jr., take notice. Rudyard Kipling and Owen Wister, Henry James, William Dean Howells, and all the innumerable caravan are invited to halt and take stock and reform their ways. Miss Libbey recently copyrighted eighty "human life" plays. Whether these are dramatized versions of those phenomenally successful novels which have enabled her to retire from the field, or entirely new and original conceptions of her genius there is no evidence vouchsafed us. It is not to be supposed that during all these years of unremitting industry Laura Jean has written nothing which she regrets. There is always the fly in the ointment, and her remorse is deep and soulful. Were she permitted to do it all again she would improve some of her titles!

Anthony Hope's Short Stories

Under the general title of "Love's Logic" there have been collected a baker's dozen of Anthony Hope's more recent short stories. For the most part they have unexpected denouements, and the reader who has not already become familiar with them in the magazines is apt to be treated to some suprises. It goes without saying that a writer as experienced as this author will never be dull, while the variety in episode with furnish something in accord with the taste of all. The McClure Company has made an attractive volume of the collection.

Pleasant Trip Through Holland

"The Chaperon"is decidely one of the best of the Williamson collaborations. One is invited to take a delightful trip through the waterways of Holland, to obesrve customs and costumes, to take peeps into the houses of high and low, visit the art galleries, museums and markets, the places of historical interest and all the odd nooks and corners, under the guidance of a most capable and all-round satisfactory young Dutchman accompanied by a lively party of four decidedly unconventional tourists. However, all's well that ends well, and with three marriages in prospect at the end of the four hundred pages, with a sufficiency of the world's goods to keep the wolf from the door in each case. It would be a critical reader who would demand more. Though the itinerary is made in a motor boat when the party is not flying over the dykes in a car, one is not obliged to inspect the inner workings of the mechanisms. Indeed, both boat and car are admirably Dutch in that they are so admirably dependable. Of course, it was frankly incautious of Nell and Phyllis to have accepted "Lady MacNairne" simply on the word of her "nephew," just as Ronald Starr took grave charges in hiring an "aunt" in lieu of the genuine article, not presently available; and it is extremely unlikely that a young gentleman occupying the financial and social position of Jonkheer Brederode would have put himself in the services of such a party because of a passing attraction of a girl he had seen but once. But without the complications thus engendered the triangular comedy of courtship would disappear and there would be left only a guide book.

Plan to Cheapen Books

Another device for the cheapening of books is reported from Paris. This time the scheme is microphotography, the photographing of miniature pages which will reduce proportionately not only the size of books but the space needed for libraries. There is said to be no practical difficulties in the way, and the plan is perfectly feasible. All that is necessary is the possession of a proper magnifier by each reader, and, of course, a willingness on the part of purchasers to accept the microphotographic volumes in place of those we have at present. There is a proposition to standardize the size and shape of the pages, and likewise, to make use of some fireproof substance in place of paper. The cost of the new products is estimated at about two per cent of the present outlay, and the scheme is, as usual, already hailed as a benefaction, but let us take pause. Some ten years or so ago it was assumed that photography would be immediately put into use as a reproductive agent and printing, except for the initial volume, which was to be the "sitter," would pass out of use. There were a dozen advantages enumerated, chief amongst them the entire absence of errors, and the perfection of fac-similies, but up to date the photographic book, if there is such a thing at all, is still a curiosity. Thumb dictionaries, meant to dangle as watch charms, and supplied with microscopic magnifiers, made their appearance in the late eighties, but they are neither offered prominently for sale nor advertised as conveniences in these days. The magnifier needful for a microphotographic volume would have to possess both size and weight, enough to make it an appreciable addition to vest pocket or hand bag. It would need to be protected from ordinary and extraordinary accident, else the defacements would soon render it worse than useless, and it would be quite as likely to be lost or mislaid as a watch or a pocket book. The tendency of the times is to increase, not diminish the size of type. The present generation would find a library of grandfather's books prohibitive for that reason if no other, and the Emersonian advice to read an old book every time one hears a new one commended would frequently find its practical solution in the giving up of all reading. There are many old books far better worth reading than any of the new, but between an old book and an old edition of a book there are many who are deprived of choice. It may be that the "gentlemen and scholars" of other days have bequeathed to their descendants weakened eyesight, which will not stand additional strain. It may be that the twentieth century reader is less avid of learning and less willing to proceed under difficulties. At any rate the fact remains that while,, thirty years ago, a pupil even in the high school who needed glasses was an exception, to-day there is not a receiving class which has not its little four-eyed gropers after light. Microphotography may result in the decrease of the cost of book production to an infinitessimal sum, but at the same time it would result in a corresponding decrease in the demand for books. What would it profit a man to succeed to such a degree that there would be gain in giving them away if there were no one to accept the gifts?

MICHAEL FARRARA,
Plaintiff,
vs.
LUCIE FARRARA,
Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA, send greeting to LUCIE FARRARA, Defendant.

YOU ARE HEREBY REQUIRED to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, on the ground of defendant's extreme cruelty, also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

GIVEN under my hand and the Seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 29th day of July, A. D. 1908.

CATHERINE STAPLETON,
Plaintiff,
vs.
ALL PERSONS CLAIMING ANY INTEREST IN OR LIEN UPON THE REAL PROPERTY HEREIN DESCRIBED, OR ANY PART THEREOF.
Defendants.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA to all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described, or any part thereof, Defendants, Greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Catherine Stapleton, plaintiff, filed with the Clerk of the above-entitled Court and County, within three (3) months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property, or any part thereof, situate, lying and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and particularly described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the westerly line of Franklin street, at its intersection with the northerly line of Ivy avenue, and running thence northerly along said westerly line of Franklin street twenty-five (25) feet, thence at right angles westerly and parallel with the north line of Ivy avenue one hundred and seven (107) feet six (6) inches, thence at right angles southerly twenty-five (25) feet to the northerly line of Ivy avenue, thence at right angles easterly and along said northerly line of Ivy avenue one hundred and seven (107) feet six (6) inches to the westerly line of Franklin street, and the point of commencement, being a portion of Western Addition, Block No. 139.

And you are hereby notified that unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit:

That it be adjudged that the plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple absolute; that her title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiff recover her costs herein and have such other and further relief as may be meet in the premises.

WITNESS my hand and the seal of said Court, this 31st day of August, A. D. 1908.

A Campaign of Cant

If not in science or literature, at any rate in politics, so far as this country is concerned, this is an age of rampant little minds,

"An age of petty tit for tat,
An age of busy gabble;
An age that's like a brewer's vat,
Fermenting for the rabble!"

For proof whereof we point to the conduct of our leading statesmen, the patriots of the hour, whose fantastic tricks are dissolving the angels in tears. A noted philosopher once said that the era of equality will bring with it as one of Time's revenges, the triumph of mediocrity, and that spleen will become the malady of the leveling age. Has the fate reserved for the democratic era overtaken us? An affirmative reply seems to be justified as we read the signs of the times in the despatches from the seat of political strife. After a century and a quarter of national existence we find ourselves constrained to select a ruler from a bunch of canting hypocrites and moral cowards, in the midst of whom we see the dignity of our common nature trampled upon and mangled before the brute image of political ambition. Surely the spectacle is pregnant with material to gladden the heart of the cynical student of political science who preaches the futility of democracy. Consider the puerility of the paramount issue in this campaign of crimination and recrimination. Is it a question of governmental policy? Not at all. It is a question entirely with reference to the affiliations of the job chasers. It is assumed that any candidate who has ever had social relations with any employe of that Gorgon of the Trusts, Mr. John D. Rockefeller, or ever had political relations with any man that squinted sidewise at the Standard Oil Medusa, will be consigned by the pee-pul

To grinning scorn a sacrifice
And endless infamy!

To save Mr. Bryan from infection Haskell had to resign as treasurer of the Democratic Committee. General Du Pont being connected with a trust received hints from Oyster Bay that he was unfit to orate for the G. O. P. Mr. Sheldon, the Republican treasurer, is reported to be undesirable because once upon a time he had a trust connection. Mr. Taft has had to explain that when he dined with a certain trust lawyer he was the guest of a decent and respectable club. "If this thing goes on," says the New York Post, "who will be left to manage the campaign? Certainly not Mr. Roosevelt, for a man shown to have been in secret cahoots with Harriman four years ago should have nothing to do with a political canvas in which only saints are to be allowed to engage." But there is no surcease. Mr. Roosevelt, the self-canonized one, the personification of the valor that plucks dead lions by the beard, has set the pace for the canting crew, and servile cringing to the mob will continue to the end of the chapter. Of course, the conduct of our leading politicians is utterly contemptible; unquestionably it is directly demoralizing, but it is, perhaps, the natural sequence of our own folly. The canting moralist has held the stage center for four years, and our applause has been continuous. Stern in his judgment of others and genial in estimating his own deficiencies, he has commanded our ardent and unwavering admiration. The rules which meet with universal observance in private affairs we have seen him set at naught in all his political actions, and instead of being revolted we celebrated his delightful unconventionality. In our affection for him we yielded all our passions to his guidance; and our hatred and envy he has directed with all the energy of his being. Under his subtle persuasion we have been prepared for just the sort of campaign we are having, and while it may be disgusting to the few that have shaken off the unwholesome obsession, there is much in it to titillate the masses.

Mr. Hearst's Impolicy

There is some doubt in the minds of friends and well-wishers of Mr. Hearst and his Independence party concerning the policy he has elected to pursue in this campaign. They question the advisability of trying to build up a new party by tearing down the reputations of individual members of the other parties. They argue that in all propaganda, political, theological and sociological the convert is lured by the promise of the doctrine, not by the wickedness of persons who may be wedded to other "doxies." By concentrating his effort upon mere personalities, Mr. Hearst, it is assumed by his friendly critics, accomplishes nothing for the cause which he advocates. On the contrary, he turns the limelight full on the political parties that he is striving to annihilate; he rouses renewed interest in those parties by men who were thinking of abandoning them to join the ranks of the Independence party; he becomes, in short, a persecutor of the established political organizations; and experience has demonstrated that as soon as persecution is resorted to by a great moral force, the thing persecuted, however iniquitous, begins to prosper even more perceptibly than it did before the persecution began. It may be true that all Mr. Hearst has charged against Senator Foraker can be corroborated by competent testimony; it is possible that Governor Haskell is all that Mr. Hearst insists he is; but what of it? The Democrats will believe all that is charged against Senator Foraker, and the Republicans will believe all that is alleged against Governor Haskell; but where does the Independence party profit by the cross-complaint of the defendants? Of course if Mr. Hearst had only attacked Senator Foraker he would have driven the Foraker men to Bryan; and if he had confined his attack to Governor Haskell he would have forced the friends of that statesman into the Republican ranks. It was better that Mr. Hearst should go gunning with both barrels; but why waste his ammunition on this sort of game? Because Senator Foraker may have committed the unpardonable sin of colaboring with Standard oil is not sufficient reason for the immediate dissolution of the grand old Republican party; because Governor Haskell has been caught in the act of allowing himself to be seduced by the octopus, is not all that is needed to blot the party of Jefferson from the pages of history. All Republicans are not like Senator Foraker; every Democrat is not a Haskell. It is not good logic to argue that San Francisco should be wiped off the map because it is afflicted with a useless and tedious graft prosecution. The Scriptures tell us that even Sodom might have been redeemed from divine wrath if ten righteous citizens could have been found among its population. Moreover, suppose the Republican party reeks with Forakers; suppose the Democratic party is putrid with Haskells—what good can accrue to the Independence party from the exposure of that condition? Is it Mr. Hearst's design to drag these Forakers and Has-kells into the Independence party? Or will he be content with the minority of rats that may leave the old hulks when they discover the sort of cargo with which they are loaded? It must be confessed that thus far in his career as an organizer of parties for purity and reform, Mr. Hearst has shown little constructive ability—his effort has been wholly destructive; and unless it is his ultimate intention to erect a better structure from the ruined material of those he pulls down, we cannot understand why he devotes so much of his time and talent to the sort of work that he seems to have in hand.

Much Ado About Nothing

Judge Dunne's friends and enemies are working themselves into such a high state of excitement over his candidacy that one might imagine them to be under the delusion that they were witnessing "a mighty drama in the theatre of the Infinitude with suns for lamps and eternity for a background." It is almost inconceivable that there should be so much pother over so unimportant a matter. Whatever happens to Judge Dunne it can make no perceptible difference to this community. His inability to try cases according to law makes him somewhat expensive, but the city is rich enough to pay for his education. It is somewhat irritating, perhaps, to sensitive persons, to have Judge Dunne thrust down their throat at every step, and to be told that one's attitude toward him is the test of honesty, but it avails nothing to storm and vituperate. Consider, for example, the useless waste of nervous energy at the meeting of the Bar Association last week when Judge Dunne's zealous and superheated friends undertook a strategic move in his behalf whereby they expected to secure an exclusive endorsement of his candidacy. Unfortunately for Mr. Spreckels's puppet his rivals were apprized of the maneuver, and their friends rallying in sufficient number to prevent the execution of the masterly coup, made it evident that the emotions which have been quickened in the legal profession by Dunne's candidacy are as poignant as those of the most rancorous partisans. Apparently the lawyers are as deficient as the members of the Good Government League in that intellectual quality which is loosely described as a sense of humor. The meeting was a stormy one, both sides engaging in a tumultuous debate, and the more virulent of the adversaries going at each other tooth and nail, might and main, as though the fate of a nation depended on the result. Now men with a fine spirit of humor permeating them would never rage and sweat in parliamentary conflict over so inconsequential a matter as that which split the Bar Association into passionate factions, causing learned men to fume and fret and froth as though drunk with choler. What if Judge Dunne's friends did exhibit porcine proclivities? Surely they are likely to do him more harm than good by making it apparent that the only aggressive opposition to him is that which they are stirring up by their impudent efforts to sweep all other candidates aside. If the members of the Bar Association who voted down the resolution calling for the exclusive endorsement of Dunne possessed a sense of humor they would have rebuked the viper brood of canting moralists from the District Attorney's office with gentle ridicule and deftly laughed them into cognizance of their vulgar stupidity. A sense of humor makes for largeness and coolness of intellectual magnanimity, and it is the most useful of all attributes in a lawyer. We strongly recommend the cultivation of it to the Bar Association for future emergencies. And we sorely lament the lack of it on that recent occasion when it was so important that the members of the Bar Association should have had a just conception of a very grotesque situation, to which Mr. Spreckels and his gumshoe mercenary contributed much significance by peopling the vicinage while the hirelings of the uncouth millionaire were doing ward politics for his immaculate judge. Surely that was no time for rage, but rather for raillery. What if the Langdons, the Heneys and the Dwyers did attempt to convert the Bar Association into an adjunct of Rudolph Spreckels's revenge propaganda? While it was quite proper to resent the project, to fly into a passion over it was a tactical blunder. A man with a spirit of humor, who always has a sense of proportion, would have resented the movement discreetly; for the man with this divine spirit never imagines that the salvation of society depends on his carrying his point; never by him are trivalities magnified into portentous phenomena. A sense of humor makes for sanity and toleration, and it abhors frenzy as well as chicanery. It is because that sense is missing in many men that we have megalomaniacs and bigots in the world, men who take everything, including themselves, seriously. To this class belong many of the men who regard Judge Dunne as the sole issue of this campaign. They are intensely in earnest. If you tell them you are not for Judge Dunne they will believe that you are a crook. But nobody should quarrel with them. They are more deserving of amiable indulgence than of taunts. Think of the misfortune of the man who cannot see a joke, whose seat of humor has never been reached and quickened! Love is the great sweetener of life, but after love is there anything so essential to happiness in this world as humor?

Good Citizens for Dunne

Of course the leaders of the Dunne movement, the mercenaries that keep Mr. Spreckel's leg warm and his vanity inflated, are not to be confounded with the good but misguided citizens who believe that Dunne, apparently from a sense of civic virtue, vindicated his pre-eminent fitness for the bench by making of himself a partisan judge; neither are some of the small fry members of the bar, the incompetents who attribute their caseless existence to the perversity of the courts; but the majority of Judge Dunne's adherents are men of excellent intentions whose mental capacity is the mental capacity of the average citizen, and they are consequently incapable of forming an accurate estimate either of his ability or his moral worth. The average citizen—the clerk in wholesale or retail store, who moves in a groove; the humble representative of a profession, who has no real sagacity for what is vulgarly known as the "low-down" of affairs; these men who are typical of the average citizen, are for Judge Dunne because it appears to them that he has antagonized the rich and powerful by his inflexible rectitude. This in their opinion, is proof irrefragable of his uprightness. At heart they are good citizens. It is because so many of our good citizens come from this class that the impression prevails that the people love to be humbugged. Of course the people do not love anything of the kind. They simply cannot help being humbugged. We confess it is unfortunate that well-meaning men should be misled by the preposterous pretensions of newspaper heroes, but we should reflect that those heroes are always draped in deceptive colors. Men with a sense of humor will never view the progress of these heroes or the things that are done in their behalf with such frenzied indignation as characterized the attitude of those members of the Bar Association who revolted at the proposition to give Judge Dunne an exclusive or any other kind of endorsement. We thoroughly realize what Judge Dunne's re-election would mean, but it would not appal us. Under a democratic form of government it is well that the people should experience the humiliation and all the minor evil consequences of their ignorance. By this process they come to appreciate the principle on which government is so constituted as to protect the people from their own folly. In the school of experience they must learn that what the majority think is not always right, and that their worst enemies are the men who play upon their passions and prejudices.

Reason and Emotion

The good citizens, who are persuaded by the artful misrepresentations of the buccaneer press, will some day, let us hope, find Judge Dunne out. Then they will be better, because less unsophisticated, citizens. They should not be expected to grasp all sides of a problem at one sitting. That is too much to expect of the average citizen. They know that the fundamental purpose of such a thing as a graft prosecution is for the civic well-being, and they argue quite logically that any public functionary who is in sympathy with so worthy an object is deserving of public esteem. And though our graft prosecution has virtually collapsed as a result of sinister influences designed to convert it into a private enterprise, which influences Judge Dunne aided and abetted, yet it is not vouchsafed the average citizen to perceive that Judge Dunne's zeal is more deserving of censure than praise. But this circumstance is one that should excite our compassion rather than our indignation. Nor should it incite us to pessimism. History proves that the world has never been right in its original estimate of men. Even Nero was beloved by the people of Rome, and his successor won the purple by reminding the people that he was the monster's confidential friend. If there are many men who believe that Judge Dunne should be kept on the bench, there to besmirch his betters, it is because their judgment, as most judgments, is determined less by intellectual processes than by feeling, and that feelings are swayed by likes and dislikes. Even the average citizen will not argue coldbloodedly that a partisan judge is better than a just judge, but his selfish feeling will prompt him to favor the partisan judge whom he believes to be on his side. Now the average good citizen believes that Judge Dunne was on his side in the graft prosecution, and it has not occurred to him that perhaps the Judge was also and principally on Spreckels's side. The fact is that Judge Dunne's adherents have the emotional part of belief without the intellectual. The case is one that presents the maximum of conviction and the minimum of reason. But the only really unfortunate thing about it is that so many good citizens, devoid of a sense of humor, have lost head and heart over it. As in all passionate controversies involving ethical principles, the men on one side believe that their adversaries are actuated by a desire to break loose from all moral obligations; and on the other, that their opponents cunningly pander to the interests of iniquity and are fit for Bedlam. How much better were it for us all to remember that nothing is so important as to live justly, to hurt no man, to give everyone his own and thus attain as close an approximation to felicity as is possible for human nature.

The Suffrage Question

As a result of the recent expression of our views on the question of equal suffrage, we are in receipt of many pamphlets, leaflets and letters setting forth information and argument in support of the cause of the women who would vote. Conscientiously and industriously we have waded waist deep into the flood of written and printed words, and now we feel that there isn't much worth knowing on the subject of universal suffrage of which we are not cognizant. We have learned among other things that there is considerable authoritative dissent from the views of the male citizen of Colorado who affirmed the failure of woman suffrage in that State. Judge Ben Lindsay, of Denver, for example, is authority for the statement that woman suffrage is a great success in Colorado. But Judge Lindsay's views, as we learned during his recent visit to this city, are sometimes misleading. We reject Judge Lindsay as an authority. With no previous acquaintance with Professor Kelly, formerly of the Iowa University, and now practicing law in Denver, him we prefer to the judge. Professor Kelly says that the experience of Colorado proves that by permitting women to vote "we get a more earnest attention to the great civilizing influences." Women, according to Professor Kelly, give dynamic force to a fresh and vital interest in the State. They are not concerned with mere partisan politics. They are interested in distinctly social questions. Now this is one of the reasons why we are not in favor of woman suffrage. While there are some social questions to which attention should be given, and to which women have given attention with most beneficent results, there are others in which there has been too much meddling. The question of private morals is one of them. We are in favor of greater individual liberty and fewer attempts to restrict the normal appetites of the many in accordance with the ideas of a wax-doll morality. We are not so dogmatic as to assert that greater restriction on individual liberty is bound to result from equal suffrage, but we say that we are apprehensive. We have observed that the most energetic women in the country are the members of the W. C. T. U., who caused the abolition of the army canteen, and we shudder at the prospect of their being permitted to vote. Nor does it affect our judgment in the least to be told that the moment we restrict the franchise we create a privileged class and that there is no argument against universal suffrage that is not a stronger argument against a democratic form of government. These propositions are not to be disputed, but we are in favor of a privileged class, and we are not convinced that a democratic form of government is flawless. Indeed we are so bold as to entertain the notion that our form of government may be improved by vouchsafing the right to vote only to desirable citizens. And, by the way, we are of the opinion that there are thousands of women who possess all the qualifications of desirable citizens, and who should be permitted to vote.

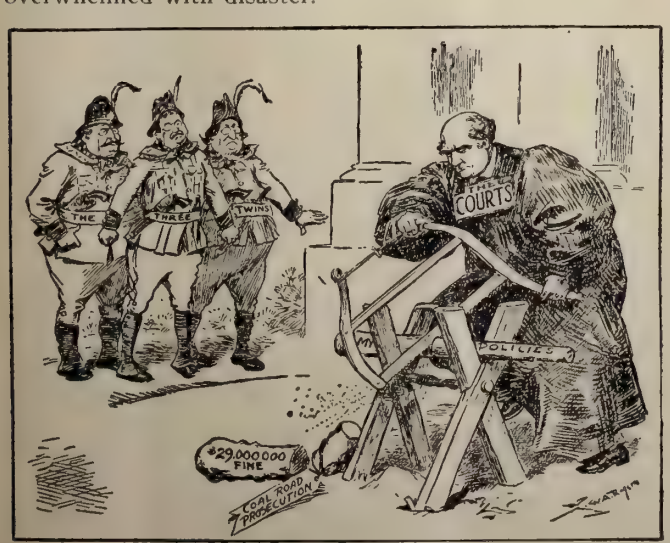
Utopian Upton

It is announced that Upton Sinclair is coming to take up his residence in the literary colony of Carmel-by-the-Sea. Presumably he is going to follow the customs of the country and live in some sort of stationary structure, cottage, bungalow or tent, but sometime ago he contemplated pioneering a colony of van-dwellers who were bent on putting socialism to a test by beating the landlord, the tax collector and all the other bears and bugbears that live and thrive in consequence of our iniquitous social system. The colony was to be "forever on the move," never remaining in one spot long enough to acquire a residence. The women were to be freed from the trammels and restraints of housekeeping, the children, emancipated alike from labor and learning, were to live the simple life, and illustrate the virtues of "back to the soil." In theory it was charming, but somewhat reminiscent of the large colonies of "movers" that used to roam all over the west, eternally on the search for an ideal place to settle where there would be nothing to do and everything to enjoy—the gaunt, sallow, sun-tanned and shiftless, always following the setting sun until they sank into nameless graves by the roadside or ended their days in some new "town" scarcely more stable than their own canvas schooners. There is no scheme too foolhardy not to find advocates and it is well within the probabilities that the Sinclair caravans would have grown like Coxey's army were it not that sheriffs and town constables, for once wise enough to cope with an evil before it had gathered full strength, announced their intention of looking upon the peripatetic colonies as swarms of vagrants. There are always a few dupes who sacrifice all they have to a "cause," but the majority of those who join in these enterprises usually are not averse to sharing the goods of others. Mr. Sinclair may be very much disappointed when he finds out that the Carmel colony is only a little unconventional within strict lines of conventionality.

Perspective Impressions

Delegates from seven coast cities have sounded the knell of sectional strife. But wait until some of them get back home!

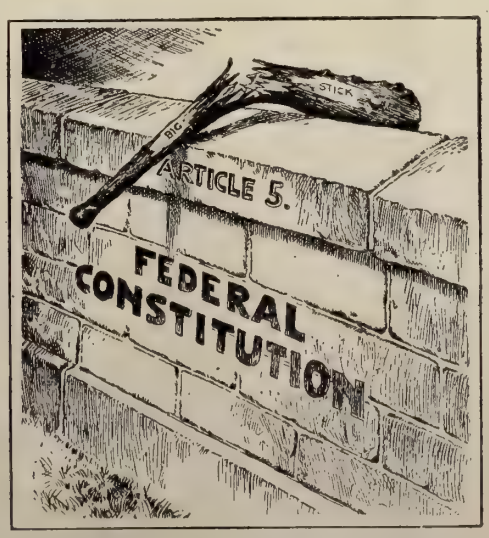
The people of Stockton have been very much surprised at the discovery that one of their reformers is a faker. And yet they are supposed to be familiar with the history of the latest reform movement in San Francisco.



As soon as Casey failed to deliver the goods it was discovered that he appointed to office a score of men who were not eligible under civil service rules. The tardiness of the discovery was probably due to the fact that Mayor Taylor was engaged in earning his other salary.

Says Governor Hughes: "If all that Mr. Bryan has favored during the last twelve years had been enacted into law, we should have been overwhelmed with disaster." It is equally true that though less than half that Mr. Roosevelt favored was enacted into law we were overwhelmed with disaster.

There ought to be some fat pickings in the contract for the removal of the City Hall ruins, not to mention the contract for a new building. There are always some practical men among reformers.



Mr. Roosevelt says that the only suit brought under the Sherman anti-trust law during Cleveland's administration was against a combination of workingmen. Quite right. It was the suit against the American Railway Union during the Pullman strike, and the result was one of the proudest achievements of one of our greatest Presidents.

"Under the Cleveland Administration," says Mr. Roosevelt, "there were no indictments against shippers for securing rebates." Of course Mr. Roosevelt knows that the Elkins' act, which made possible the punishment of a shipper was not passed until 1903. He has often officially claimed credit for the law. And yet he does not scruple at insinuating that Cleveland's Attorney-General neglected his duty in not indicting shippers.

Bestowing the Purple

Containing Historical Data from the Fragmentary Archives of Imperial Rome, Upon Which is Based a Dark Brown Hint that its Repetition is Now in Process of Tentative Application After Millennial Desuetude; to Which is Added a Personal Note Explanatory of the Author's Fear That He May Hereafter be Prosecuted for Lese Majesty.

By Democritus

Omitting a few conspicuous instances of succession to the throne or the headship of the State by nomination of the still living and reigning occupant of the office, chiefly recorded in the histories of the Italian principalities and the annals of Oriental countries, there has not been, since the fall of the Roman empire, a single example of this method of bestowing the purple.

Gibbon tells us that in elective monarchies, the vacancy of the throne is a moment big with danger and mischief. The Roman emperors, desirous to spare the legions that interval of suspense, and the temptation of an irregular choice, invested their designed successor with so large a share of present power as should enable him after their decease, to assume the remainder without suffering the empire to perceive the change of masters.

We learn from the memoirs of Velleius Paterculus and the biographies of the emperors by Suetonius, that Augustus, after all his fairer prospects had been snatched from him by untimely deaths, rested his last hopes on Tiberius, obtained for his adopted son the censorial and tribunitian powers, and dictated a law, by which the future prince was vested with an authority equal to his own, over the provinces and the armies.

Vespasian "adopted" his son Titus; Nerva, upon whom the purple was bestowed by the assassins of Domitian, nominated Tarjan, a stranger; Harian adopted Aelius Verus, a gay and voluptuous nobleman, but very beautiful, and destined never to fulfil the hope of his imperial admirer; by the basest intrigue recorded in the annals of nations Nero was named the successor of Claudius in preference to Brittanicus, the emperor's son by that monster of iniquity, Messalina; Elagabalus named Alexander Severus as his successor, and then tried to assassinate the new Caesar, thereby perishing in a vile place at the hands of the soldiers. The list of adoptive emperors is a long one but not as long as the list of Caesars vested with the bloodstained and vice-bedraggled purple by the praetorian guards. And in most cases the adoption was as fatal as the election, either for the wearer of the purple or for the leading citizens of Rome. It didn't make much difference who sat on the throne of the Caesars, the massacre proceeded just the same and the "succession" was accomplished as soon as those personally interested in securing control of the government could reach the person fortuitously in possession of the robes and insignia. Sometimes, as in the case of Nero, it was a case of cold steel, and again, as in the case of Claudius, it was a dose of cold poison. The job of governing the Roman empire was one of the most precarious that ever fell to the lot of man; it was, unquestionably, a great honor to be a Roman emperor, but it was also more frequently a death sentence than a joyous tribute.

Since the downfall of the Roman empire the system of adoption and the nomination of a successor to fill a probable vacancy on a throne or in a "chair," has been generally abandoned by civilized nations. Modern monarchies are governed by families, and the succession is determined by birth like any other inheritance. The trend of government, however, is away from the hereditary and monarchical idea. As men become more enlightened they resent the family system of directing the destiny of nations, and they have frequently rebelled against the father-to-son method of transmitting mastership.

Republics governed by a democracy are steadily becoming the rule in human affairs. And so far advanced are we of the twentieth century in this popular notion, that if anybody should propose to resume business at the old Roman government stand, he would be promptly read out of the party to which he might happen to belong. Any political party in the United States that should place in its platform a plank demanding that Congress should immediately upon convening, frame a constitutional amendment enabling the President of the republic to name his successor, he would be consigned to oblivion as fast as the voters could poll their ballots. Adoption, succession, and hereditary right to the presidency of these United States is entirely contrary to the genius of our scheme of government. If anybody should attempt to force a "successor" on us we would feel that the republic was doomed and that imperialism was in the saddle.

The only successor to the presidency that the American people will consent to tolerate is one elected by themselves to a second term in that office. We could elect a President to a third term if we so desired; there is no constitutional prohibition to that kind of "succession"; but we wouldn't do it, and no President has had the nerve to ask such suffrage from us. When we set up this form of government we removed the purple from the wardrobe of our Presidents, and we decreed that no citizen's hat shall hang on the peg of the rack in the White House more than eight years. In that time, we surmise, it will be possible to find a fit successor somewhere in the ranks of the common people. Usually it only requires four years to find a citizen whom we think available to "succeed." There is not the slightest objection to suggestions from anybody as to the best "successor," and, in fact, it is the privilege of every American citizen to make such suggestion. Moreover, the American citizen is never backward in advice of this sort. But, as I have endeavored to make plain by inference at least, the purple cannot be passed from the shoulders of one American President to another without the consent of the governed.

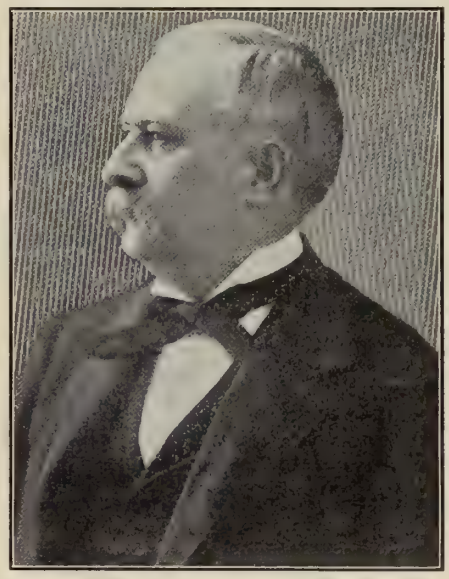
I assume that the moral of this little essay is entirely obvious to the dullest understanding. I also assume that the bulk of my readers are above the average of intelligence, and that these have caught the drift of my intent from the caption of my theme. These acute readers will not only penetrate the dark allusion throughout my discourse, but they will appreciate my reason for thus seeking to avoid all future penalty for the crime of violated majesty that may hereafter be enacted by order of a possible dictator wearing the purple of an adopted successor to the chief magistracy of what may some day be an imperial estate sustained by a genuine, old-fashioned, Romaneque praetorian guard. I am taking no chances on the future.

Personal Abuse in Political Campaigns

Reminiscences Showing That History Has Repeated Itself in this Year of Our Lord—The Morey and Mulligan Letters—Charges of Dishonesty Against Blaine and Garfield—The Situation in Ohio—Belief That Roosevelt Has Hurt Taft More Than Foraker.

Not for the first time have the platform issues in a Presidential campaign been abandoned on account of the paramount interest of the public in sensational letters produced with malicious intent. In this respect the present campaign bears something of a resemblance to the campaigns of 1880 and 1884. In 1880 Garfield was obliged to give his attention to attacks made upon him on account of the Morey letter which was designed to lose for him the vote of the States on this coast. Those were the days of the agitation over the question of Chinese immigration. Twelve days before the election a New York newspaper published a letter purporting to have been written by Garfield early in the year to one H. L. Morey of Lynn, Mass. The communication appeared to be a reply to a letter written to General Garfield for the purpose of obtaining his views on Chinese cheap labor, and was as follows:

House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C., January 23, 1880.



Dear Sir: Yours in relation to the Chinese problem came duly to hand. I take it that the question of employees is only a question of private and corporate economy. Individuals or companies have the right to buy labor where they can get it the cheapest. We have a treaty with the Chinese government which should be religiously kept until its provisions are abrogated by the action of the general government, and I am not prepared to say that it should be abrogated until our great manufacturing interests are conserved in the matter of labor.

Very truly yours, J. A. Garfield.

The day after the publication of the letter in New York, Garfield sent the following telegram from his home in Mentor, Ohio, to Marshall Jewell, chairman of the Republican National Committee: "I will not break the rule I have adopted, by making a public reply to campaign lies, but I authorize you to denounce the so-called 'Morey' letter as a bold forgery, both in language and sentiment. Until its publication I never heard of the existence of the Employers' Union of Lynn, Mass., nor of any such person as H. L. Morey" An investigation showed that no such person as H. L. Morey lived at or near Lynn, Mass., at the time the letter was dated, and that no such organization as the Employers' Union ever existed in Lynn.

Though Garfield triumphed in this matter he never did answer to the satisfaction of his opponents charges somewhat similar to those that have been made against Senator Foraker. The charges to which I refer are those that grew out of the Credit-Mobilier scandal. They were to the effect that when he was a member of the House of Representatives he used his influence to put through measures for his own financial benefit. Throughout the campaign he was accused of accepting Credit-Mobilier stock at a low rate as a return for his vote in Congress. The Credit-Mobilier Company was chartered in 1859 by the State of Pennsylvania, and was authorized to build houses, buy lands, loan money, etc. The company did nothing for several years, but in 1867 its chief representative, Oakes Ames, came to Washington and told several members of Congress confidentially that his purpose was to buy lands along the line of the Pacific Railroad, where they thought cities and villages would grow up. Among those with whom he talked on the subject was Garfield, and it was afterwards asserted that Garfield accepted $1,000 worth of stock, and received from Ames a dividend of $329. A committee of the House of Representatives investigated the matter, and reported in 1873 in favor of expelling certain members and censuring others. Garfield was not in either list, and he declared, before the committee, that the only money he had ever received from Ames was a loan of $300, which he had repaid. Garfield was also charged with having received a bribe while in Congress. It was shown that he received a fee of $5000 from a company that had a patent on a wood pavement. This pavement was adopted by the local authorities of Washington, over whom Congress has supreme control Garfield argued in favor of the pavement before the local authorities, and he acknowledged that he received a fee of $5000, but said that he received it as an attorney and not as a member of Congress. Yet Garfield was elected President, and Garfield's son, a member of Mr. Roosevelt's official family, is hot on the trail of the wicked trusts.

James G. Blaine, like Garfield, was involved in the Credit-Mobilier scandal, and he was investigated by Congress in 1876 when he was a member of the House. It was charged that he had used his influence in favor of corporations. and had profited largely in consequence. The Mulligan letters were letters produced by James Mulligan which Blaine had written to Warren Fisher, Jr., of Boston. It was claimed that they showed that Blaine had received $64,000 from the Union Pacific Railroad Company for services rendered. Blaine made a dramatic defense in the House of Representatives by reading some of the letters. His defense was satisfactory to the Republicans of his own State. A month later he was appointed by the Governor of Maine as a member of the United States Senate, to fill the vacancy caused by the appointment of Senator Lot Morrill as secretary of the United States Treasury, and was elected for a full Senatorial term in 1883.

In every attempt he made to secure the Presidential nomination, however, the Mulligan letters were brought up against him. They figured in the Republican national conventions of 1876, 1880 and 1884, in all of which he was a prominent candidate. When he finally secured the nomination, in 1884, the Mulligan letters would not down. They caused the loss of thousands of Republican and independent votes. He might have been elected, even with this loss, but for the Burchard incident.

Whether Foraker will be as successful as Garfield and

The Writing in the Sand

By F. Harland Davis

I.

Sanzo sat in the temple garden, clad in the black robe of a Buddhist priest. He watched the little children playing, some racing about with kites, some demurely sitting in groups. It was one of his priestly duties to instruct these children, to teach them how to use the brush in order to make Japanese characters, and to unravel later on some of the sacred sutras in his simple and beautiful way. And Sanzo was a gentle and very loving teacher, who imparted his schooling with so much grace and charm that his small scholars delighted in all he had to say. They learnt their letters because Sanzo had told them of a great man of old who could write letters on the sky and upon running water. How delightful it would be to paint black strokes on the sky, and send honorable love to the Moon Lady, or to write upon the river at the coming of iris bloom!

Often the children in the long summer evenings when the red peonies swung like Chinese lanterns among their green leaves, would sit around Sanzo and listen with breathless interest to his wonderful stories. Little maids would weep at his whimsical fancies, and press their dolls very close to their small breasts. One by one the children departed, with a loving farewell to their master. Sanzo still sat on in the garden, watching with half-closed eyes the lotus-covered lake.

He was aroused from his reverie by the sound of a soft footfall caming from the garden of a small An-dera (nun's temple) that joined the temple in which Sanzo served the Lord Buddha and his little children. Then, very softly, came the sound of a woman singing, and these were the words of her song:

"If you want to meet me, love,
  Only we twain.
Come to the gate, love,
  Sunshine or rain;
Stand in the shadow, love,
  And if people pry,
Say that yau came, love,
  To watch who went by."

Sanzo knew the song well. It was part of a song from the Flower Dance of Bingo province. He had heard it sung by a woman he once loved, long, long ago. To more effectually bury that love he had become a priest. How haunting old songs were! Why did a Buddhist nun sing a song that was so far removed from the Peace that the Lord Buddha gives?

Sanzo rose, and fingering his beads, peeped through the pine trees, and saw the singer of the song. She was watching him, her pretty face wreathed in smiles. All the sacred sutras and all the sacred practices of her Order had not pressed out the dimples that came and went in her cheeks. Sanzo trembled as he watched her. He tried to turn away his eyes, but they wandered back to the singer of the song. He assiduously counted his beads. All in vain. The old memory of his love came back again and tingled and surged through his veins. The singer of the song was Tokiwa, the woman he had once loved, and, alas for his peace of soul, still loved now! "Go away, Tokiwa, go away!" said the priest softly. "Never sing that song again. Oh, why did you come? Pray to Kwannon, our Lady of Mercy—— I don't love you now. The past lies buried and forgotten——"

Sanzo stopped speaking. How could he speak when Tokiwas was sobbing? How could he look when her dear head was pressed close to the ground? Sanzo closed his eyes and clung for support to the branch of a tree. And when he looked again Tokiwa was gone.

The next day Sanzo made inquiries at the An-dera and learned that the temple contained no nun answering to the description of Tokiwa. Whereupon Sanzo inferred that she must have entered the garden with a view of attracting his attention. It came as a little relief to him to learn that Tokiwa had not become a nun. The gods had not made Tokiwa that way.

Sanzo went about his duties with a preoccupied air. The children were the first to notice a change in him. He would commence telling them stories and leave them unfinished. Once he nursed a doll for such a long time upside down that all the girls laughed at him, and then sucked in their breath and begged his honorable pardon for being so rude as to laugh at a holy bozu (priest). And once when he was singing ever such a funny song tears came into his eyes, and they were not tears that came from laughing.

"What is the matter with our dear bozu?" said one little follow solemnly.

"I fell asleep under a fir tree," replied Sanzo, trying to smile. "My mouth was very wide open—oh, so wide open, like a small cavern, and some pine needles came fluttering down, went into my mouth, and dug their little points right into my heart! And that is what we call pricking of the heart."

"And will the pine-needles ever come out again?" said the same little boy still more solemnly.

"No, I am afraid not, but you must not look so solemn or Jizo (the god of Japanese children) will put you in his long sleeves, thinking you are too frightened and miserable for this world. See, I will draw in the sand the figure of Hotei (the god of Contentment). He has big lobes to his ears. He is always laughing and that makes him so fat that you generally find him sitting down."

II.

One night when Sanzo was sitting in the temple garden trying very hard to think about the Lord Buddha sitting on a big Lotust flower in Nirvana, he fell asleep. So soundly he slept that he did not hear Tokiwa singing in the next garden, in such a lonesome, quivering little voice:

"If you want to meet me, love,
  Only you and I,
Come to the pine tree, love,
  Clouds or clear sky;
Stand among the spikelets, love,
  And if folks ask why,
Say that you came, love,
  To catch a butterfly."

When Tokiwa had finished singing, she peeped into the garden. "There he is!" said she. But he took no notice of my song. He pretended that he did not hear."

Then the moon rose and shed a silver glory over the still form of Sanzo. "He sleeps. Surely I may go and watch him while he sleeps?"

And Tokiwa clambered over the fence and crawled along, like a beautiful snake, with her little red mouth close to the ground. She saw Hotei in the sand, and murmured softly: "Ah, how he loves children!" For a moment she paused. Then she stretched forth one finger and wrote, "Sanzo, I love you so!"

Now she drew close to where Sanzo sat. Very carefully she raised herself till she was in a kneeling posture. She looked like a devotee worshipping the figure of some beautiful god. Her eyes shone brightly, and there was an expression of intense love on her face.

"Oh, to be able to look at him always so," said Tokiwa gently. Whether sound of her voice fashioned a sweet dream in the mind of the sleeper I cannot say; but a smile played about his lips, and Tokiwa smiled back at him. "He loves me in his sleep," she said.

In the meantime a second figure crawled along in a like manner to Tokiwa; but it was not like a beautiful

How the Money Is Being Spent

One of Town Talk's inquisitive subscribers has written to me for information regarding the Relief Fund. He wants to know whether the money has been exhausted and if not to what purpose the balance on hand is being applied. Upon inquiry I learn that the Fund is far from exhausted. There is still on hand the magnificent sum of $400,000. It was the sense of the trustees that this money should be spent in endowing beds in the hospitals of the city, a sensible way, it strikes me, of winding up their trust, but for some reason the money is being spent under the direction of the Associated Charities. As a consequence it is gradually being consumed in salaries, for organized charity always involves a great deal of red tape, and red tape is never manipulated merely for somebody's health. It requires, I believe, about fifty persons to perform all the labor involved in the distribution of charity under the auspices of the Associated Charities. And of course a high priced expert must be employed to audit accounts for the trustees of the Relief Fund. It appears also that somebody deems it of great importance that track should be kept of all persons who received aid from the rehabilitation committee. And to that end men are employed to visit those who received assistance that enabled them to resume business after the fire. It is probably not very pleasant for those who were so unfortunate as to need assistance to be constantly reminded of the fact by busybodies in quest of information respecting their affairs, but the men engaged in drawing salaries must have some means of showing that they are not unworthy of their hire.

"Waiter, this bill of fare is dated ten days ago."
"Bless your soul, that makes no difference, sir; we're still carrying those things."

His Light Uncovered

Usually when a Californian goes to foreign parts and achieves distinction a thrill of pride seizes the friends of his youth, and with much enthusiasm they celebrate his merits and recount those performances of his early career that signalized his adolescent talent and presaged his later triumphs. Not so in the case of the Hon. T. Carl Spelling. I doubt whether there are three men in town who have heard of the success that has attended Mr. Spelling since his departure hence. Doubtless in the years that have elapsed since T. Carl withdrew his tireless voice from the councils of the local Democracy he has been entirely forgotten by men whose acquaintance with him was as intimate as that of Hamlet and Yorick. Doubtless there are some amongst us who have attributed the protracted silence of him to death, feeling sure that nothing short of consignment to the deep, damp vault could render him so unobtrusive as he has been. For in days not long ago Mr. Spelling was one of our most vociferous citizens. A lawyer by profession, his practice came in short gasps, for, it must be confessed, he gave no token in those days of latent ability. As a luminary of the bar he yielded more heat than light, and among the illuminati he was regarded as a flickering taper. But in the Iroquois Club he was quite as brilliant as E. P. E. Troy and almost as noisy. Today the Hon. T. Carl Spelling is one of the leaders of the bar, not generally recognized, but sufficiently so to be on Mr. Roosevelt's staff of special pleaders. I have heard it said that Mr. Roosevelt's failure as a trust buster has been due principally to his inability to distinguish a lawyer from a lobster, but he probably improved his acumen before hiring the man from California. Mr. Spelling is special counsel for the government in the commodity rate case which is being tried in Philadelphia.

Kowalsky and Leopold

In striking contrast to the obscurity in which Mr. Spelling's performances have been conducted is the publicity which has always attended the doings of that ponderous but buoyant Californian, Henry T. Kowalsky. The bushel of sufficient size to hide the Colonel's blinding light has yet to be found. Even when he was but a provincial lawyer, engaged in supplying the San Francisco market with illegitimate children guaranteed to consume the superfluous hoardings of dead millionaires, the young orb of his budding genius cast its rays far and wide, and so well recognized was the resourcefulness of this genius that every rich bachelor in the State was in mortal dread of being Kowalskied in the Probate Court. In time the Colonel perceived that for a man of his ambition and talent the California field of industry was hardly broad enough for exploitation, and so he wandered away and established headquarters in New York, where he has become a notable character. From time to time the Colonel's triumphs have inspired the press, and the curiosity of his friends in San Francisco respecting his doings has never been starved. It is well known that long since the Colonel established social and professional relations with royalty; that he had ingratiated himself with Leopold of Belgium, and that in his occasional trips to Brussels he was entertained at the Palace where his ability as a narrator of racy stories was much admired. It is also well known that the Colonel was engaged in creating a sentiment in this country favorable to the operations of the Belgian government in the Congo State. Of the Colonel in this capacity I have lately come across some interesting news that will be appreciated by those who knew him in the days when he was establishing claims of illegitimate heirs in Judge Coffey's court.

Official Representative of Royalty

The latest news of Kowalsky's doings comes to me by way of a German weekly, the Echo, published in Berlin. The Echo recently republished a letter sent from Brussels to the Berliner Tageblatt, which exposes the methods by which Leopold cultivated European and American sentiment. It is said that the chief of his publicity bureau is Secretary Liebrechts of the Congo State, who established a press bureau in Brussels which is known as "The Committee for the Protection of Colonial Interests in Africa." This bureau, with an unlimited credit, has subsidized newspapers in several European cities and sent speechmakers all over the world. The chief representative of the bureau in this country is Colonel Kowalsky, who is described in the letter as follows: "Kowalsky was a member of the legislature of San Francisco, and besides, like all important people in America, is a colonel. He maintained a steady correspondence with the king and spoke to him of the Sisyphus-like work which he was doing in the interest of the sovereign of the Free State. These letters form the humoristical side of the Congo tragedy. They always begin with the words 'my dear majesty' and close 'with repeated assurances of my deep respect and my sincere friendship' or 'with the warmest wishes for the happiness and the good health of Your Majesty. Long life to the king! Always at your service.'" How typical of our breezy friend the Colonel! How absolutely conclusive of the genuineness of the letter are the sentiments and language!

His Great Love for the King

If after reading the foregoing there is any doubt in your mind that the letter was written by the Colonel read this excerpt from another letter and be assured: "Yes, I confess that have come to feel an affection for Your Majesty such as I have entertained only for my beloved, never-to-be-forgotten father. Therefore you may find in all America no person more devoted to you nor more determined to raise the banner of your Majesty to the top of the highest mast." "This devotion," says the correspondent of the Tageblatt, "will be understood when it is known that Kowalsky, in the course of time lightened 'his dear Majesty's' pocket of $45,000, equal to 225,000 francs, that is more than twice the sum promised to him, 'in the event of the American government, during the legislative session, making no declaration in disparagement of the Congo State and of Congress abstaining from an unfavorable resolution."

A Charge of Bribery

These letters and others, it is explained, are photographic copies of the originals made "by a dismissed officer of the Corgo Press Bureau named Landre. They are not all humorous. The Tageblatt correspondent makes some pretty serious charges in connection with his explanation of how Kowalsky earned his money. For example: "The American Senator Morgan had moved for an order of the day condemning the Congo government. This motion was referred to a committee whose secretary was also the secretary of Morgan. Kowalsky bribed this secretary, whereupon the unfaithful employe was discharged by Morgan. Furthermore Kowalsky corresponded with one Wack, an editor, whom he even introduced to President Roosevelt and whose usefulness can easily be inferred from one of his letters written to the king, in which he says: 'Simply take the present concessionaries by the collar and force them to share their privileges with the Americans.' As a result of this proposal, the greatest American money magnates actually received shares of the monopolies of the Congo State. Nevertheless Colonel Kowalsky failed in his mission. The vote taken by the committee on foreign affairs of the American Parliament in the year 1907 upset all calculations, and a few months later Kowalsky had ceased to be an agent for the Congo State."

The Colonel Renigged

From the foregoing it is evident that Colonel Kowalsky has been supplied with cause of action against the Tageblatt, but the Colonel is such a gay, careless soul that he is not likely to take the matter seriously. The charge that he bribed a secretary will probably have less effect on his emotions than the loss of his royal job, which must have been quite suitable to his taste. "People who ought to know," says the correspondent, "declare that he received in all nearly half a million francs from the king." And the correspondent winds up with the following good story: "The king, by the way, found it an all but easy undertaking to rid himself of the spirits he had called. One day the 'dear majesty' feared 'indiscretions,' but Mr. de Cuvelier knew a way out of it; Kowalsky was to be sent to the fever coast of Nigeria to annoy the English and to familiarize the world with the horrible conditions existing in the cotton plantations of the British Society—conditions closely bordering on slavery. Kowalsky hesitated, but finally consented. He left for London, where he bought himself clothes for the tropics, a Sudanese helmet and a gun for the elephant hunt. Thus prepared Colonel Kowalsky courageously boarded the steamer and sailed—back to New York. The New York American, which related the story with good humor at the time, finished the report with the words: 'In this manner the hippopotamus and the lions of the Niger land were saved from a sad death.'"

The Bard of Berkeley

Adair Welcker was introduced to New York last week through the medium of the Sun. I fancy that some of my readers will ask Who in hell is Welcker? Not to know Welcker is to argue yourself unfamiliar with the literature of California. But to be candid I will confess that as familiar as I am with it, for lo! these many years I had forgotten all about Adair. When I read of him in the Sun I recalled these lines addressed to the most persevering of poets by Ambrose Bierce in the days when that distinguished guardian of the Temple of the Muses was on the alert for presumptuous intruders:

> The Swan of Avon died—the Swan > of Sacramento'll soon be gone;
> And when his death-song he shall coo,
> Stand back or it will kill you too.

From the Sun I learn that Welcker is no longer of Sacramento; that he is now known as the Shakespeare of Contra Costa. According to the Sun he has written a dramatic poem entitled "Louis XVI," which he has read aloud in various places and which has been rejected by the Century Magazine. He wrote this poem in Berkeley, where it excited many raptures. Here are a few lines from it on moonshine:

> See how the moon's soft rays come gently downward,
> As if the watchful angels up in heaven
> Had sent these cooler rays down from the sky
> To rest so softly where the hot sun blazed.

"How true," says the Sun, "how elevating! Catch that sense of direction, down-up-down." This is obviously a sneer. The critic is evidently insensible to the beauty of the imagery in the sublime conception of the angel's manipulating the lights after the manner of electricians behind the scenes. Nor doubtless does he appreciate the deftness with which Poet Welcker transformed the adjective in the first line into an adverb in the fourth. The idea of soft moonshine resting softly and ameliorating the hotness by its softness is one that can be appreciated

The Doctor, the Dean and the Mayor

Mayor Taylor has been acquitted by the directors of the Hastings Law College of an accusation charging him with a breach of contract. The accusation cited, in effect, that Edward Robeson Taylor had contracted with the directors of the Hastings Law College to devote all his time to the duties of the office of dean of the college; that Edward Robeson Taylor aforesaid had subsequently, by reason of his appointment and election to the office of Mayor of the City of San Francisco, utterly neglected to perform the duties appertaining to the office of dean of the college; and that, notwithstanding this neglect on the part of the aforesaid Edward Robeson Taylor to perform said duties as a dean he continued in enjoyment of the salary of $4000 per annum contributed for this purpose by the taxpayers of California. Incidentally it was announced in this connection that the salary of Mayor is $6000 per annum, a total income from the public treasury into the bank account of Edward Robeson Taylor aggregating $10,000 a year. The facts alleged were not denied. The terms of the contract were admitted. But it was stated by friends of Mayor Taylor that before he accepted the office of Mayor he consulted the directors and received their permission to earn the additional salary, nothing further being stipulated regarding the earning of the salary as dean of the college. As a matter of fact the majority of the directors were wholly ignorant of the contractual obligation binding Edward Robeson Taylor to devote his entire time and ability to the duties of dean of the college. The matter came duly before the directors of the law college in secret session and these learned attorneys after deliberating one hour and twenty minutes returned the Scotch verdict of "not proven." The directors were under no more imperative obligation to inform the public that they had arrived at this or any other decision, than they were to permit the reporters to be present at the trial of Dean Taylor. The announcement of the verdict was a condescension for which we are as grateful as we ever are when our public servants vouchsafe to tell us what they are doing with our money and what they intend to do with the remainder. The proceedings were in camera; the verdict might with equal propriety have been kept in obscura.

When a Contract is Not a Contract

Since the onus of Edward Robeson Taylor's unearned increment has been shifted from the broad shoulders of the honorable Mayor to the multi-shouldered board of directors of the Hastings College of Law it will be for them to decide whether the money paid to Dr. Taylor is from the State treasury or the endowment fund of the college. As far as the Mayor may be heerafter concerned it is a matter of personal dispute between Edward Robeson Taylor and that citizen's conscience. If Dr. Taylor is not earning the salary of dean of the Hastings College of Law, his conscience will get the better of the argument; if Dr. Taylor can convince himself that his position as Mayor and his eminence as a writer of poems is sufficient offset for a salary of $4000 from the treasury of the law college, his conscience will have to confess judgment —there is no appeal. All of which confirms the belief of the layman that it is useless to attempt to kick against the pricks of the law. Apparently the contract between Dr. Taylor and the directors of the Hastings Law College was unilateral; the lawyers of the board of directors have proved to their own satisfaction that it was bilateral. In the jargon of the legal profession it was an indeterminate contract, the terms of which cannot be fixed by all the parties acting for their true interests, because the circumstances are such that no agreement (nor acquiescence in a non-agreement) can be reached until other motives act. What those motives may be Dr. Taylor or Mayor Taylor or Citizen Edward Robeson Taylor may determine.

The Sophistry of Ethics

Since the board of directors of the Hastings Law College have exonerated Dr. Taylor from all blame in the premises, without repudiating the contract requiring Dr. Taylor to devote all his time to the duties of the college deanship, the question naturally becomes one of ethics rather than one of ambiguous legal obligation. Is Mayor Taylor committing a grave or glaring ethical wrong in accepting a salary for Dr. Taylor that is not earned by the doctor? Was Dr. Jekyll morally responsible for the acts of Mr. Hyde? Can a man serve two masters; the one actively and the other constructively? Let the casuists tackle this problem in its metaphysical aspect; the plain citizen in the street is not fit, mentally, to grasp the subtleties of a syllogism propounded by Duns Scotus. At the very outset of the contention the wayfaring man is flabbergasted by the phrase "ethical wrong." It seems to him a contradiction of terms. If it is wrong to draw two salaries and render no service for one of them, how can it be otherwise than "ethical?" What distinction does Dr. Taylor make between an "ethical wrong" and plain, ordinary, everyday immorality? In the Federal government service the ethics of official duality is clearly differentiated. It is presumed that one man cannot do two things as well as he can do one thing, and that as the government pays its employes for doing all things to the best of their ability a two-man job cannot be other than a job for two men. The economic intention in this instance is probably superior to the merely ethical principle involved; for there are not enough government offices to supply all that wish to fill them; but in the last analysis of the proposition it is a moral postulate. Mayor Taylor is psychodextrous. He is a doctor, a lawyer and a poet; he is a politician; he is a linguist; he is an orator, a philosopher and a man of affairs; his executive ability is acknowledged by everybody; his activities are as many-sided as the thoughts that inspire them; there is probably no other citizen of San Francisco who can do so many things as thoroughly as they can be done by Mayor Taylor. It came to us, therefore, as a shock to hear that Mayor Taylor had neglected his duties as dean of the Hastings Law College, for the performance of which he is paid $4000 a year. We were surprised to hear that he had concentrated his entire intellect upon the inferior duties of Mayor. Having read what Mayor Taylor had said in condemnation of "glaring ethical wrongs," we wondered why he had not kept his contract with the directors of the Hastings Law College to devote all his time to the college, while merely collecting his salary of $6000 a year for occupying the office of the mayorality. Why did he reverse the process? He was under no contract, lateral, unilateral or bilateral, to give himself exclusively to the performance of his duties as Mayor. A mayor of the city of San Francisco may commit no ethical wrong, glaring or otherwise, by being a dean of a law college; but a contract dean of a law college cannot, ethically, be also a mayor of a city. So let the chatechism end there; and since Mayor Taylor is unquestionably earning his salary, let us give Dean Taylor an unearned salary as an honorarium in compliment to the versatility of his genius.

Edgar Mizner (placing an empty glass on the table)—"I have been to three mining corporation meetings today. I certainly deserve that bracer."

Ed Morphy (as he lifts a well-filled glass to his lips)—"Well, I have tarried in twenty-nine cafes. I need this thought eraser."

Mizner (an hour later, poking his head into the door of a private room at the club)—"Say, Ed. Ned Greenway is down stairs and wants to see you."

Morphy (from the depths of a chair)—"Tell him I'm out."

Mizner—"I've already told him you were all in."

Goodwin in His Protean Role

Last week was an extremely strenuous period for Nat Goodwin. Within the six days he gave a spectacular exhibition in the local mining exchange by buying wads of his favorite mining stock in an excited pit, issued a pronunciamento that he would retire shortly from the stage and devote himself exclusively to mining interests "in his dear old Nevada," obtained an uncontested divorce decree from Maxine Elliott, turned over Rawhide to discover what developments had come to light there since his eventful visit last April, and confided to a trustful, beaming southlander that Los Angeles was destined to become the rendezvous of the world, the greatest theatre town on earth, and that when he retired from the stage a year and a half hence he was going to build a theatre there, "just because I must have something to do and a show house of my own will keep me interested."

An Ideal Part Framed for Him

He admitted that the realization of this golden dream depended on the success of his Rawhide mine. In fact Goodwin's exits and entrances just now seem to be hanging on the success of that venture. Every time he makes an excursion into outside lands where kopecks grow instead of stage money he does missionary work in trying to create a demand for its shares. On his last visit to Europe he tried to induce a number of French capitalists to come here and examine the property. The brokerage firm he represents is burning incense night and day, maintaining steadfast incantations, and holding "the thought" to get the bankers within reaching distance, for French capital is sorely needed since banker Rickey ate up all the "Dutch" savings that had sought safety in the sagebrush. Brokers in the local stock exchange think that the genial actor will top all his successes by having a play written around himself in his present role of a Western mining promoter. He dresses and acts the part to the life. No stage picture could have eclipsed the scene last week when he appeared at the pit side in the local exchange and in full-throated bellicose defiance bid up the price of his favorite stock. The famous Stock Exchange battle in Frank Norris's "The Pit" was a drowsy beer hall caricature compared with it.

Reno as a Mecca for Divorce

The record time made by Goodwin in getting a divorce decree from his wife is certain to make Nevada the Mecca of all dissatisfied married couples yearning to sever their marital ties in a jiffy. To be sure Goodwin stands close to the influential Nevada powers and all inconvenient legal obstacles were shood off the track in order to assist a good fellow to make a record run. His case will furnish a number of valuable pointers to Virginia Harned and Sothern. The ease and expedition with which the decree was granted has completely knocked the props from under South Dakota as the paradise of mismated pairs. The dream of the optimistic old Reno practitioner, as recounted in Town Talk some weeks ago, seems almost on the eve of realization: "This town'll soon be able to furnish a divorce while the applicant is stopping over between trains."

Station Agent (to couple warmly embracing on platform)—"Rush lively there; the train is starting."

Merryboy—"We don't want your train. We came here to kiss without being kidded."

Flouting St. Paul

Evidently the ancient Pauline dictum that woman shall keep silence in the churches and commanding them to be under obedience, is wholly obsolete in this year of extreme grace. No longer is it a precept in any of the churches (because most of the tabernacles are supported by women perhaps), that if women will learn anything let them ask their husbands at home; for it is a shame for women to speak in the church as prescribed by St. Paul the misogynist in his first epistle to the Corinthians, xiv. 35. Mrs. Helen Moore is a conspicuous exemplar of womanly revolt against the anti-feminine regulations of the old tax-gatherer and repentant persecutor of the early Christians. Mrs. Moore is not accused of disturbing the peace of churches, but there is ample reason to believe that she would not hesitate to do so if the occasion required, or if in her best judgment the interests of the congregation justified her loudest oratory. It is printed in the current record of the city that Mrs. Moore has objected "in no uncertain tones," or coy terms, to Governor Gillett's proposition to bond the State for $18,000,000 with which to build roads. Some of the arguments offered in this protest by Mrs. Moore are good; others are not so good and one or two quite indifferent. Her best reason for deferring the construction of the roads is based on her statement that there are 75,000 children in California who are not going to school. From this statement she deduces that the ignorance and idleness of these children begets jails and that jails beget taxes, and that if the money which it is proposed to put into roads were used for educational purposes there would be fewer jails and less taxes; or that the money saved from the jails would build the roads while it is educating the children. Who will say that woman is devoid of the logical sense, or that she is not capable of reasoning in a complete circle?

A Woman That Dared

Another point made by this lady in the forum is to the effect that good roads will not, as contended by the advocates of that kind of highway, aid the producers of fruit and garden truck; because, no matter what produce be brought to San Francisco, if it falls below a certain price, stipulated by the dealers, it will be dumped into the bay. True; 'tis pity; and pity 'tis 'tis true. But, my dear Mrs. Moore, stop a moment and reflect that as the greed of trade disposes of the overproduction of fruit and garden truck in any event, the building of good roads will neither increase the waste nor mitigate it; and that therefore the farmer will lose no more in this regard by reason of the good roads than he does now under the system of bad roads, county roads and railroads. Mrs. Moore made other objections to the Gillett project, but these are sufficient to confirm my original text regarding the antagonism of the modern woman to the Pauline definition of woman's rights. She is not learning in silence with all subjection; neither is she subscribing to the humiliating prescription that she shall not teach nor usurp authority over man. She may, for the sake of argument (in which most women delight), agree that Adam was first formed, then Eve, as the old Roman who held the clothes of those who stoned Stephen, the martyr, insists; but she can certainly find good reason for disputing the apostle's corrollary that "Adam was not deceived, but the woman being deceived was in the transgression." Paul is certainly a far-back number with the up-to-date woman.

"I've got a broken tooth that aches horribly," said the garden rake leaning against an old tree.

"And I've got a decayed root that nearly drives me mad," returned the tree.

A Task for Hercules

I hope that I shall never be called upon to participate in a "prize story contest" as one of the "readers" of the stories. This hope is not inspired by the thought that such occupation would be profitless, for it is the custom to pay these "readers" a sum of money somewhat exceeding the amount of the "first prize." It is the magnitude of the task and the drudgery involved that appals me. A local publication recently offered a graduated series of prizes for "the best story containing not more than eight thousand words nor less than three thousand." The announcement is now made that 1056 stories were received and that these stories will be read and judged by three competent critics of short stories, none of whom is in any way connected with the publication offering the prizes. I have been calculating the day's work of these readers. I find that if only the minimum of short story is offered the judges will read 3,168,000 words; that if the maximum is contributed they will read 8,448,000 words; and that if the probable average of 5000 words per story is submitted the aggregate will be 5,280,000 words. An average fatted "seller" of modern fiction contains about 100,000 words. According to my minimum estimate the readers of these prize contest stories would have to read a mass of verbiage equal to thirty-one "sellers" of full capacity and an excess equal to the verbal area of two "novelettes"; if the maximum is the stint they will read the measure of eighty-four "sellers" and a "novelette" of 48,000 words; on the basis of an average output of the prize story industry the readers would read something equal to the contents of fifty-two novels and two novelettes of 40,000 words each. Assuming that the readers cover 200 words a minute they would complete their task, working twenty-four hours a day on the average product, in fourteen days and twenty hours; say fifteen days. But the rules of the Readers' Union do not permit the members of that organization to work more than eight hours a day or to read more than 130 words a minutes. Therefore on this average estimate of the words submitted in this prize story contest, these readers must consume 40,615 minutes, 676 hours, or, under the union rule, a total of two months and twenty-four days. As only fifteen stories can be accepted the time expended on the reading of the remaining inferior 1041 stories is absolute alms for oblivion, wasted effort—O monstrous! but one half pennyworth of bread to this intolerable deal of sack!

Blasted Hopes

No doubt the stories adjuged "the best" by these readres will be good stories; perfect in form; compact as to matter; conventional, perhaps, in the requirement that they shall have a beginning, a middle and an end; they will be "wholesome," optimistic, after the manner of the approved style of the modern magazine school of this sort of literature; nor it is expected that even the chosen fifteen shall equal a Balzac's "Passion in the Desert," a Daudet's "Siege of Berlin," Stevenson's "A Night's Lodging," Maupassant's "Horla," Poe's "Gold Bug," or Hawthorne's "Ethan Brand." But aside from the emolument accruing to the winners of the prizes, the readers and the publishers, will they be worth while? Imagine, if you can, the woe that will surge back with those rejected manuscripts! Picture to yourself, if possible, the disappointment, regret, envy, chagrin, that will gnaw like vipers at the hearts of a thousand aspiring authors —mostly feminine, largely immature, wholly incompetent but vain of a secretly nursed ambition to achieve a name in literature! The majority of these thousand rejected authors probably devoted a whole week to the composition of the thing that was rejected. They have devoted the rest of the time intervening between the sending of the manuscripts and the announcement of the lucky winners, to hopes and fears, doubts that were easily brushed aside, dreams of success that persisted vividly in waking hours, and fond yearnings that grew upon them as the time of final reward drew nearer. Then to be crushed by the verdict of the readers! I sometimes wonder why Dante overlooked the pit of disappionted authors while touring Inferno and Purgatory.

Not So Black as Printed

The ever-authentic, always-exact, never-in-error daily newspapers of this city announced last week that Japanese spies were swarming all over the military encampment at Atascadero. These spies wore more disguises than have ever been dreamed in the wildest philosophy of Sleuth Burns; they came not as single spies, but in battalions; agents of the Japanese secret service were there in the role of cooks, laundrymen, roustabouts, valets, waiting-men at table, hostlers and groomsmen to the Colonel's prancing war steed; in the thickets roundabout lurked Japanese lieutenants and drum majors of the engineer corps busily taking furtive notes of all that was going on in the camp; on the heights commanding a view of the scene of impending strife three generals of the Japanese army disguised as vegetable peddlers and fruit pickers were distinctly observed in the very act of surveying all the movements through field glasses made in Germany. The war correspondents at the front neglected to tell us what object these Japanese spies had in acting in this manner at a time when the world was wrapped in the slumbrous apathy of profound peace, but they did say that the Japs were causing "considerable comment among the officers." What this "comment" was we are left to infer, but it must have been something serious or it would not have been so conspicuously mentioned in the dispatches from the firing line. I am at liberty, however, to publish the comment of these same officers concerning the war correspondents who discovered the Japanese spies. It sounds like "damphools," but it is spelled differently. As a matter of fact the Japanese spy or any other is welcome to swarm all over the ungory field of Atascadero. There is nothing to conceal at Atascadero. To say truth, we are rather proud of ourselves in military pomp and circumstance and would not be in the least abashed if all the world came to look at us in the full panoply of our fuss and feathers. Of course we require that the spies shall observe certain formalities—it wouldn't be a real military outfit if it wasn't tied up with a little red tape. No doubt our mimic heroes at Atascadero would not be averse from receiving a few Japanese hints from competent Japanese military spies. The cooks and waiters' union can keep the Japanese of these professions out of the loose jobs hanging around Atascadero, but there is no union to exclude the Japanese spy; he may even take service in Judge Lawlor's court under Detective Burns without protest from the labor organizations. The Japanese spy is as free to come and go, to look around and report, to mess with the non-coms and the Jackass battery, as is the war correspondent in all his glory. And when you know him the Jap spy is not a half bad sort of chap, companionable, genial, polite, intelligent and absolutely harmless. I would rather hire a Japanese spy to second-cook in my kitchen or wait on my table than pay half the money for an emancipated lady of all work. And I never think of demanding references setting forth the official rank of these spies in the regular army of Japan; it is wholly immaterial to me whether my servitor is a major of artillery or merely a captain of infantry.

Plenty of Money Behind Him

Though Mr. Rudolph Spreckels has gone East ostensibly for the purpose of confabulating with Joe Folk, the exploded Missouri statesman, and "Battle Bob" La Follette, the most vociferous of demagogues, there is no danger of Judge Dunne's fight being neglected. Rumor hath it that Mr. Sprcekels is going East to sell a few bank bonds, but though he may be short of money his captains appear to have a large supply on hand. They are making a whirlwind fight for the one just judge, and the tenderloin is very much pleased. As enough money has been dumped into the poolrooms to make the Spreckels puppet a favorite in the betting it is evident that the Dunne boosters have a very satisfactory source of sup-

"The Reconciler"

Judge Graham's success in patching up domestic quarrels and persuading applicants for divorce to abate their animosities, has made him an object of interest to the magazine editors of the East. The latest exploitation of the man who has minimized the divorce evil in San Francisco is Human Life, a magazine edited by Alfred Henry Lewis. In this magazine Judge Graham is alluded to as "The Reconciler." "Judge Graham," says the editor, "is a self-made man and he knows the hearts and impulses of the humble, which contributes no small part of his success as a reconciler, combining human insight with a natural shrewdness and kindliness."

Judge Cook Discusses His Critics

With Judge Carroll Cook patience has ceased to be a virtue, and he has taken to the platform to discuss the censures that have been heaped upon him by the men on the tripod. Judge Cook, though one of the best lawyers on the bench, is not much of a spellbinder, but what he has to say about the Spreckels-Phelan newspaper organs will hold the average audience for awhile. And what he has to say is convincing becaus it is all a matter of record. It appears that he has not only neglected opportunities of becoming a newspaper pet, but that he has had the courage to refuse to be a newspaper puppet. He tells how the vindictive Spreckels family tried to win him by cajolery and failing turned upon him in their characteristic wrath and made him a target of abuse. Judge Cook has made quite clear the animus of many of the assaults that have been made upon him, but he might have gone further and explained that the blackening of his character was essential to the designs of the graft prosecution. The District Attorney has contrived to keep all the graft cases out of Judge Cook's court, because he knows it is the one criminal court in which he would have no advantage over opposing counsel. To justify the assignment of all cases to Lawlor and Dunne, the bosom friends of Mr. Spreckels, it was deemed advisable to hold Cook up to obloquy. But as events have transpired it now appears that the prosecutors would have been better off in Cook's court, for Judge Cook would have saved them from their blunders.

To Pull Together

A movement which has been fostered for the past five years for effecting a closer relationship between the Pacific States on commercial and political lines is approaching realization. The movement was started in 1903 by The California Promotion Committee, which believed that by community work the interests of California, Oregon, Washington, Nevada, Idaho, Utah and Arizona can be advanced in many ways. Meetings are now being held which have the furthering of this movement in view, and during the session of the Trans-Mississippi Commercial Congress some definite plan of action will probably be formulated. It is the idea of the Committee to have each State organize as California is organized, with local organizations in various counties working through a central organization, as the local organizations of California work through The California Promotion Committee, and these State organizations to form a Pacific States organization for furthering all matters that pertain to the development of the whole region involved. Many questions that are of importance to the welfare of all of this region can be satisfactorily solved if the organizations be effected and consolidated, and the Committee believes that a combination could be thus formed that would make the United Pacific States a power that would compel recognition in political and financial circles. As a result of the proposed organization all matters requiring Federal aid for the territory west of the Rockies will have the full strength of the combined congressional delegations of six States and one territory.

One of the Old Aristocracy

The passing of Mrs. Sarah Cox in San Rafael recently reminds one that the late generation of successful hostesses is passing away. Mrs. Cox was never one of those entertainers whose constant exploitation in the society columns was so heavily scored by Mrs. Astor, Sr., in New York the other day, but she gave most delightful little dinners at which the guests were not only of social prominence but of mental distinction. Mrs. Cox was the daughter of a pioneer, Captain Johnson, who lived for years in the South Park district when that was the fashionable part of town. Her first husband was a Mr. Miller, who left her a young and attractive widow with one son, Henry Miller, who married Miss Mamie Merrill, one of the brunette beauties of the Rincon Hill set. Ernest Cox, Mrs. Miller's second husband, died a few years ago.

By R. E. Mucahy.

The general political scare which has for its foundation the result of the Maine election has shown itself to have been well worked so far as its effect entered into security values. The decline in stock values of from ten to twenty dollars per share was not warranted; that a reaction of a few points was anticipated and that it would have put the market values on a firmer basis cannot be contradicted. It would appear to a close observer of market-wise actions the decline was greater than had been intended by those who control the situation, no doubt they saw too much stock coming out to attempt to stem the tide until sufficient outside support was in evidence to assist in checking the crazy overthrow of holdings by scared holders. The situation was one like many others previously seen, where a flock of sheep kept jumping the fence until the last one was over, then the rebound came in no small way; the short seller was the buyer, and when he wants to buy it is not a question of price. It's buy at any price. Added to this condition was the bargain hunter; he was on hand and absorbed a large line of floating stock; again added to these conditions were the market leaders, they were busy taking back the stock they sold at higher prices; the result shows how nervous and extremely timid capital can be, especially during a presidential campaign, where one candidate has a clear walkover, and the other is doing an advertising stunt. There may be a few small setbacks in security values before November 3rd, but on all such declines stocks and bonds should be purchased. One must not lose sight of the lesson recently taught in the way of economy. Economy has been the watchword throughout every line of business and no small part has entered many of the greatest households. The lesson has been well grounded into the minds of those who are sane; of course there will always be found rattle brains who will go headlong into new ideas and commitments which will result in their being wiped out of their money and prestige; such people will never learn otherwise, and it is well that nature has provided a means whereby they are taken out of the way of the world's commercial progress. Progress and prosperity have never been so much in evidence in the history of America as they are today. Look back: When before were crops so bountiful and prices so beneficial to the producer? On all sides is heard contemplated improvements throughout the Pacific Coast. When conditions are analyzed, for instance, for the two states of California and Nevada, how astounding are their resources in agriculture, mineral and otherwise. California has a harvest every month in the year; no other state can make such a showing. California produces $1,500,000 of gold (new money) every month in the year. Think of the copper and silver also produced, then add to these advantages the vast amount of money realized for farm products. The future of California and Nevada is beyond the comprehension of the human mind. Irrigation will solve the agricultural problem for both of these states. Ten years hence will make millions of acres of the desert land of today into green fields, capable of supporting many millions of people. There are many sound reasons to advance why the greatest development for the coming ten or twenty years will be west of the Rocky Mountains and the greater part of it in California, Nevada and Arizona. Arizona is capable of growing the finest quality of cotton in the world. The market gives every evidence of advancing materially higher. It rests at present upon the political situation. If Taft is elected prices will go higher. If Bryan is elected prices will go lower; these two conditions are the barometer of the market.

This famous cordial, now made at Tarragona, Spain, was for centuries distilled by the Carthusian Monks (Pères Chartreux) at the Monastery of La Grande Chartreuse, France, and known throughout the world as Chartreuse. The above cut represents the bottle and label employed in the putting up of the article since the Monks' expulsion from France, and it is now known as Liqueur Pères Chartreux (the Monks, however, still retain the right to use the old bottle and label as well) distilled by the same order of Monks, who have securely guarded the secret of its manufacture for hundreds of years, taking it with them at the time they left the Monastery of La Grande Chartreuse, and who, therefore, alone possess a knowledge of the elements of this delicious nectar. No Liqueur associated with the name of the Carthusian Monks (Pères Chartreux) and made since their expulsion from France is genuine except that made by them at Tarragona, Spain.

Will She Bar Him From the Dances

As if there were not enough seasoning for tea biscuits, there is another jar of pate eagerly sampled by those who cannot sip their Oolong without trimmings. It is whispered that a certain gentleman who manages the affairs of a smart apartment house by day and attends Greenway functions at night, has incurred the displeasure of a lady who has never had to combine such business with her pleasure. Last season she lived in the apartment house over whose destinies he presides and their vibrations did not travel harmoniously. It is a delicate task to have to discuss things like defective drain pipes with a man who may that very night dance with your daughter. After a great many unpleasant experiences the manager of the apartment house is said to have put a prohibitive price on the particular apartment occupied by the lady and she indignantly stormed out of the place into other quarters. Her retort courteous is to the effect that society ought to put a prohibitive price of admission that would bar out such men. It will be interesting to see whether she manages to dispossess him from the rights and privileges of the smart set.

He Faded Into the Gloaming

San Francisco has happily been called "The Coast of Chance" in a recent novel and certainly the latest tea table gossip could not penetrate the doings of a society rooted in established traditions and firm standards. On this coast of chance periodically an adventurer sails into port, puts up a good front, hands in forged credentials and is accepted by society. Then Somebody comes along from Somewhere, whispers a tale, and the ships that pass in the night carry out an adventurous soul. It would appear that a certain gallant foreigner who was made much of in a set not distantly related to Burlingame, belonged to that ilk, and now he has dipped under the horizon and is shedding the light of his presence on new worlds.

"The Broilers" Weren't On the Side

Mr. Greenway gave a luncheon the other day which may be a token of the new rules and regulations he has imposed on his followers. Last year there was not a Greenway dance that was not illumined by the presence of some fascinating actress, Fritzi Scheff and Billie Burke walking off with the honors. But it is whispered that now Mr. Greenway intends to bar the profession, though he has no objection to entertaining them on the side. As proof he gave a luncheon for the clucking little chick-a-dees in "The Girl Question" and these cunning little broilers were not the only hot birds served.

The Warfield of the Drawing Room

A faded fad laid away these many years in lavendar, has been dragged out and freshened up, to the surprise of those who thought that elocution had gone out with tatting and guessing games. But it is now very smart to part the evening on the side with a recitation or two. Nothing so overblown as "Casabianca" nor so strident "Curfew" is permitted, but providing the selection out-Ibsens Shaw and is swaddled in repression, it is well received in a drawing room. The leading exponents of this revamped parlor trick are naturally recruited from the band of amateur Thespians who had an attack of stage fever and several relapses, last winter. Mrs. Mark Gerstle has not a stout prejudice against reciting in the drawing room, between dramatic courses at the theatre, but the most energetic champion of the manly art of elocution is now Harry MacDonald Spencer. This handsome young Englishman has a dramatic sense that rarely exists outside of the syndicate. As it is there are those who regard the Josselyn sisters as a syndicate for the exploitation of the dramatic ability of their brother-in-law. "Oh, do recite something," they enthusiastically chorus, and young Spencer agreeably saunters down-center front and sprinkles the latest dripping from his own pen. He used to recite bits of Ibsen, Maeterlinck and the rest of the tucked-in-chin school, but he discovered that he had literary ability of his own that made excursions into the foreign market unnecessary and now he rarely does anything not of his own composition.

Recites His Own Compositions

An author who can voice his own wares has an advantage over the scribbler who can never be sure that even his best friends have read his masterpiece. fertile imaginings of his brain, but there is scarcely anyone in society who is not familiar with them via the happy idea of recitation. His young wife has some dramatic gifts herself, but she is content to sit in the front row of her husband's admirers when it comes to a drawing room stunt.

No Gaiety Dances this Winter

After a lively discussion of the dancing forecast of the winter the Gaiety Club has decided not to meet this winter. The club is composed of twenty-five exclusive members of the younger set and the list is never extended. Should a member become engaged she at once resigns and a new member is elected in her place. When a dance is given each member sends in to the committee the name of the man whom she desires invited and if the candidate passes the general vote an invitation is issued to him. As the members all belong to the Greenway Assembly and will also join Mrs. Alexander's Colonial gatherings, they concluded that there would be enough dances supplied for the winter, especially as a number of extra private parties are already on the cards.

The Test for Her Fiance

Miss Maud Welsh, whose wedding with Mr. Frank Dutton of San Francisco, is scheduled for the end of October, is receiving a great deal of social attention in Stockton, where her family is prominent. Her father, the late J. M. Welsh, was for many years connected with the rich milling interests of Stockton, and was personally a plain, unassuming man of the large-hearted type. Miss Welsh is the youngest of three daughters, one of whom, Grace, was married some years ago to Mr. W. E. Elliott of San Francisco, and the other, Beatrice, became the wife of Stewart P. Elliott, who is now looking after the Welsh interests in the flour mills. The two men, by the way, are not related, though bearing the same name, but both are so handsome that Miss Maud laughingly declares she knows when she presents her fiance to her Stockton friends their first thought will be: "Is he as handsome as the others?" And if the verdict is against Mr. Dutton they will feel that she is not doing her duty to her family as her sisters did. Miss Welsh is herself very petite, even fragile in appearance, and of the same quiet reticence that was so marked in her father.

Will Be Toasted by the Spinners' Club

The Spinners' Club will give a large luncheon at the Century Club on Tuesday, October 13th, in honor of the Misses Ardella and Elizabeth Mills, who will leave on October 15th with their mother to spend the winter in New York. Mrs. Harry B. Torrey will be the toastmistress of the occasion.

Under the Orange Blossoms

The representatives of the exclusive Southern families filled Trinity Church, last Monday morning, to witness the marriage of Miss Nannie Crittenden Van Wyck, daughter of Mrs. Sidney M. Van Wyck, Sr., and Rev. Austin Brockenborough Chinn. The bride never looked lovelier than in her exquisite wedding robe trimmed with rare old lace, an heirloom in the family. She carried a very beautiful shower bouquet of delicate orchids. Little Miss Elizabeth Putnam, the daughter of Osgood Putnam and a niece of the bride, dressed in a dainty pink frock, was the only attendant. Dr. Crittenden Van Wyck escorted his sister to the altar and gave her into the keeping of the groom. Sidney Van Wyck, Jr., was best man.

Mrs. Stott was formerly Miss Rolla Ford, and is a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Tirey L. Ford. She has been widely entertaining her girlhood friends who are to be married this fall, the last being Miss Clarisse Lyon, whose wedding to Albert de Brettville will take place next month.

Owing to the sad death of Miss Laura Van Wyck, two years ago, the family being still in mourning, only the immediate members of the family were bidden to the wedding breakfast which followed at the home of the bride's mother. Bishop Nichols officiated, assisted by Dr. Clampett. After a brief wedding tour, Rev. Mr. Chinn and his bride will reside in Menlo Park, where the groom has lately been appointed pastor of Trinity Episcopal Church.

Moved by a Mother's Love

It would be surprising if the motive behind Mrs. Frank Sullivan's recent gift of the Robert Louis Stevenson home to the Carmellite Sisters was tinged more deeply with mother love than mere religious fervor. In accordance with the mother's silentwish her daughter has been sent out here to join the sisters in the spacious new home at Lombard and Hyde streets. The only occasion upon which these cloistered devotees can ever mix with the world is for the three days a new convent is thrown open to the public. I hear that Gladys Sullivan shows an inclination to follow in her sister's footsteps, and it would be at least some satisfaction for Mrs. Sullivan to feel that her daughters are in the same town with her, even if she can converse with them only through a screened grating.

One of the Old Regime

News was reecived in this city some days ago of the death in England of Mrs. Mary Frances Johnstone, mother of Lieutenant Ernest Johnstone, surgeon of the 14th Cavalry, now stationed in the Yellowstone Valley. Mrs. Johnstone had many friends in this city, having at one time lived here with her son and daughter-in-law. There was a strong bond of attachment between the younger Mrs. Johnstone and her husband's mother, and all three went to the Philippines together the second time Lieutenant Johnstone was ordered to the Islands. Mrs. Johnstone, by the way, was in her own right the Comtesse de Beaumont, but she never used the title here. She was the last of her branch of the family. The Beaumonts were among the "emigre families" in England. They never returned to their own country except during the brief restoration of the legitimaist line.

Preparing for the First Cat Show

The Del Monte Cat Club is the latest addition to the clubdom of the city. It is already a member of the American Cat Association and numbers among its members some of the most prominent cat fanciers on the Coast. The club will hold its first annual show at Del Monte on the 16th and 17th of October. Miss Gertrude Blaine, who is a great cat fancier and is looking after the entries here in the city, says that already more than half a hundred entries have been made and the outlook for the success of the show is exceedingly bright. In order to stimulate the interest in the show it has been decided that it will not be necessary for the particulars of pedigree to be known. In case the cat's record is not known it may be entered as such in the unknown class on the entry list. A splendid array of trophies has been provided by the club. Mrs. Norton who is one of the greatest authorities on cats in the country will come from Los Angeles to judge the show. She has donated a handsome cup for one of the premiums.

Agnes Tobin to Lecture

Miss Agnes Tobin has a cultivated pen which does not drip commercial ink. She has made a place for herself in the world of letters without the whip of necessity stinging through the air, but as her work is not the sort of hammock literature which makes a "best seller" her talent is not fully recognized out here. The other day I read a review of Miss Tobin's work in an English magazine which made me realize the importance of the project of having her give a series of lectures this winter. On October 31st she is to talk on "Celtic Renaissance" at the Vendome, and Joaquin Miller and Charles Warren Stoddard have likewise offered to lecture on favorite subjects. This affair is for the benefit of the Sisters of the Holy Family. A number of people interested along the line of thought which Miss Tobin illumines are urging her to give San Francisco another opportunity of hearing her lecture.

New Feature in Afternoon Teas

Following close on the announcement of the completion of the subway entrance on Powell Street the management of the Fairmont now announces another surprise which will be appreciated. This is the inauguration of the "Afternoon Tea Service in the Laurel Court." From 3:30 to 6 every afternoon, beginning October 15th, a special menu, with the best of service, will be given. A musical program will be given each afternoon during these hours. It is the intention of the Fairmont to make this one of the distinctive features of the winter. In the Carlton Hotel, London, the afternoon tea is one of the events of the day and brings out a crowd of fashionable people. In the Waldorf-Astoria, New York, the afternoon tea is featured almost as prominently as the dinner itself. The Astor Hotel also makes a feature of this in the "Orangerie," where a service similar to the one just inaugurated at the Fairmont is rendered. It is safe to predict an immediate popularity for these afternoon teas as at present there is no place of the kind in town where a lady can take her friends. The conduct of this new department is under M. Victor Rector and will be on the

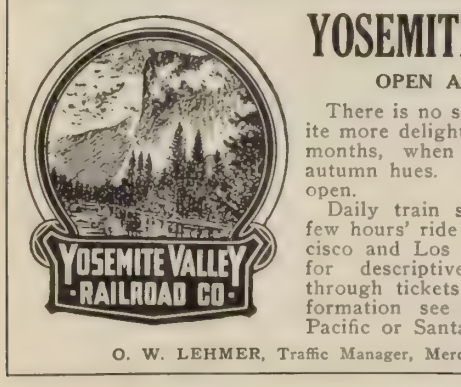
A Forest Idyl at Del Monte

Shakespeare himself could have wished for no grander setting for his beautiful forest idyl "As You Like It" than will be given it at the open air performance Saturday afternoon, October 10th, at Del Monte. In handling this performance Frank Matthieu has made a bold stroke. The first part of the play takes place before the Ducal Castle, the balance in the Forest of Arden. In the open air, changes of settings are usually impossible, but in this instance Mr. Matthieu has conceived the idea of playing the first part on the lawn of the Del Monte Club House, which, with the natural surroundings, give the effect of the castle and courtyard. He then shifts the whole performance to the Del Monte lawn, where amid the big trees and shrubbery as perfect a forest as can be desired is found. The characters will be sustained by members of the San Francisco Stage Society and of the Monterey Civic Club, the principal male characters coming from this city and the chief female characters from the old capital of California. Mrs. John R. Dobbins is the moving spirit of the latter organization and has coached the Monterey members of the cast. The afternoon open-air performance in the Del Monte grounds will be followed by an evening performance at the Work Theatre in Monterey. The proceeds of the performances will be devoted to the restoration of the old theatre in Monterey, in which tradition has it that the Swedish nightingale, Jenny Lind, once sang. The social features of the Del Monte Hotel centering about this event will be a dance in the ball room on Saturday evening, with the usual outdoor sports on the day following. Many motor parties have been planned to go down to the performance as well as a number of train parties, who will go down on the 3 P. M. Del Monte express, Friday.

The Coming Recital of Miss Wilson

Among the fair members of the Friday Fortnightly Dancing Club is Miss Frances Wilson, the handsome young daughter of the L. F. Wilsons of Berkeley, who will give a piano recital at Century Hall next Wednesday evening. It is an almost unprecedented event that so charming a member of a smart dancing club should go in deeply enough for musical culture to be able to do a thing of this sort, but Miss Wilson's friends will not be surprised, for they have long known her to be possessed of great ambition to develop her pronounced musical gifts. Only a few weeks since she distinguished herself by playing a beautiful program at the Greek Theatre of the University, where she pursues the social science course. The acquisition of knowledge seems to come with great ease to Miss Wilson. Since her graduation from Miss Head's school a year ago she has taken an active part in countless social events on both sides of the bay; her personality radiates far more of youthful vivacity and gayety than of sober, studious proclivities. Much interest is felt in the forthcoming concert by several mambers of the University faculty, who consider Miss Wilson an exceptionally creditable student.



Forthcoming Debutantes Teas

Mrs. Edwin S. Newhall will give a large tea at her new home in Pacific avenue, Saturday, October 24th, in honor of her two daughters, Miss Virginia and Miss Frances, who will make their formal debut in society. This will afford the first opportunity the many friends of Mrs. Newhall have had to view her new home. After planning the house, according to her own ideas, Mrs. Newhall submitted her views to an architect. He declined to carry out the plans on the grounds that they were too "original." So Mrs. Newhall set about directing the building of the structure herself. It is said to contain a number of innovations and curious effects, but it thoroughly pleases Mrs. Newhall.

This coming Saturday, October 10, will witness the formal introduction to society of Miss Harriet Alexander at the tea given by her aunt, Mrs. Mountford Wilson. At the same function Miss Elizabeth Woods, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Robert Woods, will also make her bow in the set she is sure to grace.

Miss Innes Keeney, daughter of Mrs. Charles Keeney, will join the social circle of the elect at a tea to be given later in the month in the Century club rooms.

Mrs. John McMullen will give a very large tea at the

One Bachelor Less

Dr. John Staley Hanlon, whose engagement with Miss Theresa Marks was announced this week, is the president of the Bachelors' Club, which numbers several of the young members of the medical fraternity. He is an ardent motorist and chauffs his own machine. Miss Marks is a very handsome young woman with rich coloring and large brown eyes, such as might delight an artist. Her mother was the daughter of a well-known pioneer who brought his family here when his little girl was only eight years of age. Mr. and Mrs. Edmund Marks have four daughters, of whom Dr. Hanlon's fiancee is the second, and two sons. Miss Josephine Marks, the youngest daughter, is a fine amateur violinist.

Notable Exhibit of Arts and Crafts

Much interest is being taken by artists and all lovers of art throughout the State in the announcement that an elaborate exhibit of Arts and Crafts is to be held at Idora Park, Oakland, for two weeks beginning Monday, October 19th. For a number of weeks past, collectors have been going to all of the larger cities of California gathering art treasures which will be shown at this exhibition. It is the purpose of those having the Idora exhibit in charge not only to show the public the best in local art holdings, but, at the same time, to illustrate the inner workings of craftsmanship. To this end, long rows of shops will be built in the Idora Pavilion and in these shops, workers will be seen actively engaged in the fashioning of beautiful things. Books will be bound and illuminated in the full view of the visitor; wrought iron candle-sticks will be fashioned; vases will be beaten from brass; bowls formed from clay and then burned in the kiln, banded with gold and painted. The setting of the entire exhibit will represent the streets of Nuremberg. Scenic artists are now at work reproducing the architecture and coloring of the old German village. For those who prefer the product of brush and lens, there will be a large art gallery hung with choice selections in painting, water color and photography. The patrons of the exhibit are: Mrs. P. R. Boone, Mrs. C. C. Clay, Mrs. Phoebe A. Hearst, John Galen Howard, F. C. Havens, Miss Ethel Moore, F. M. Smith, Mayor Edward Robeson Taylor, Raphael Weill, President Benjamin Ide Wheeler and Theodore Wores.

Successful Opening of the Hotel Manx

When the Hotel Manx opened at Powell and O'Farrell, last week, another notable hostelry was added to those on or near Union Square. The Manx is under the management of N. M. Kellar, formerly acting manager of the Knickerbocker Hotel, New York City, and prior to that of the St. Regis and Waldorf-Astoria. This new hotel is up to the highest standards of excellence. In decorations and furnishings and what it has to offer the traveling public it ranks with the best. In charge of the culinary department is Emile Burgemeister, who was for many years sous chef to M. Bailly, now of the St. Regis. The basement cafe is now being decorated and will be one of the most attractive in the city.

In the Social Spotlight

Mrs. Joseph B. Crockett and Mrs. Samuel Knight sailed this week for the Orient to be gone several months. Mrs. Knight hopes her health will be benefitted by the trip.

Captain C. E. Clark and Mrs. Clark, U. S. N., are at the Fairmont. Captain Clark will be remembered as the gallant commander who took the battleship Oregon around the Horn under her own power in time to participate in the battle of Santiago. The record for that voyage has not yet been eclipsed. With the Clarks are Mrs. E. E. Robison and Mrs. C. F. Hughes of Seattle.

Mrs. George Peltier and Miss Jeanette Peltier of Sacramento are registered at the Fairmont.

With the coming of the Trans-Mississippi Congress the Fairmont is filled with the men who are prominent with the work of this important organization. Among them are J. B. Case and party of Abilene, Kansas. Mr. Case is the president of the organization. Among those with him are Mrs. Case and C. M. Hargan.

Since the opening of the Powell street subway, as the new tunnel entrance of the Fairmont has come to be called, it has jumped into immediate popularity. It cuts down the elevation and the incline fully one-third and makes the Fairmont with its street car lines on three sides the most accessible hotel in San Francisco. The subway is the longest entrance of its kind in the world, being almost three hundred feet long.

William Duncan has just arrived from the East on a visit to his aunt, Mrs. Griffiths, of Ross Valley. His sister, Miss Duncan, is engaged to Richard Girvin.

Mrs. J. W. Shaw, wife of Professor Shaw, of Berkeley, is registered at the Pacific Grove Hotel.

Among the arrivals at the Hotel Coronado last week were J. H. Hine, Edward Kendall, Mrs. L. Schwabacher and nurse, and James H. Schwabacher.

Among the arrivals at Byron Hot Springs from San Francisco during the past week were: Rev. T. R. Lynch, Mr. and Mrs. James Shea, V. W. Gaskill, Mr. and Mrs. W. Chisholm, Mrs. A. McLeod. From Oakland: Hugh Goodfellow, Fred R. Sherman, Mrs. William Hinckley Taylor.

Ex-Governor George C. Pardee and Mrs. Pardee, accompanied by Mr. and Mrs. C. V. Daniels, are enjoying a pleasant sojourn among the pines of Pacific Grove.

Miss Maye Coburn will be the guest of Mr. J. de Barth Shorb this winter.

Mrs. John Bidwell has returned to her Chico home.

The C. O. G. Millers have returned to this city for the winter.

Mr. and Mrs. Eugene de Sabla, Mr. and Mrs. Clement Tobin and Miss Leontine de Sabla are planning to spend the winter in New York. They will probably leave the latter part of this month.

Mr. and Mrs. Burke Holladay will arrive from New York this week.

The engagement is announced of Miss Francis Reed, daughter of Mrs. Campbell of Sausalito, and Henry Rideout of Boston.

Mrs. M. H. de Young and her daughters, Miss Helen and Miss Constance, arrived from Europe this week and are resting in their San Rafael home before opening up their town house for the winter. Miss Helen de Young's marriage to George Cameron will take place next month and will be followed in a few weeks by the marriage of Miss Constance de Young to Joseph Oliver Tobin.

Mr. and Mrs. Vincent Neale have returned from abroad and are again settled in their attractive San Rafael home.

Mrs. W. B. Hooper has closed her handsome summer home at Mount View and has taken a house in Pacific avenue for the winter.

Buffalo Bill is easily the most picturesque looking guest now staying at the St. Francis.

Miss Jennie Crocker was hostess at an informal luncheon in the Hotel St. Francis Thursday afternoon. Her guests were Mr. Walter Martin, Miss Virginia Jolliffe, Miss Gertrude Jolliffe and Miss Mary Jolliffe.

W. R. Wheeler, Assistant Secretary of Commerce, has engaged rooms at the St. Francis for the Trans-Mississippi Commercial Congress, during which time he will act as President Roosevelt's personal representative.

The opening of the Colonial ball room in the Hotel St. Francis will assist materially in inaugurating one of the most brilliant social seasons in local history. The initial dance will be given by Mrs. Henry T. Scott early in December, and the series of Colonial dances that follow, under the patronage of prominent members of the smart set, will do much to raise these social functions to a more elaborate level than they were before the big fire.

The Belasco Brand

All over the country there are ambitious playwrights planning new scenarios and grinding out dialogue by the ream with the fond expectation of achieving fame and fortune. This expectation it seems to me, after having sat through a performance of "A Grand Army Man," should not be hard to realize, for the manager by whom this play was produced is not only avid for raw material but he is easily satisfied. I allude to Mr. David Belasco, the world's greatest hack-dramatist. All that Mr. Belasco requires is a plot containing the germ of an idea and susceptible to treatment for atmospheric effects and development of types of character. Given this groundwork he will do the rest. If by reason of simplicity of plot the complications are attenuated he will supply the exposition with atmosphere and the action with character painting. He is truly a wizard in the manipulation of atmosphere and his character painting is sometimes admirable in its minuteness. Of literary style he knows nothing, but his characterizations are often rich in those cunning touches that proclaim the keen observer, and the public is always carried away by the charm of his atmosphere and the intensity of his situations. There was a time when I supposed that Mr. Belasco required some originality of plot, but when he accepted Richard Tully's "Juanita of San Juan" and whipped it into shape for production under the title of "The Rose of the Rancho," I found I was mistaken. Not, however, until I witnessed a performance of "A Grand Army Man" did I become aware of the egregiousness of my error. This play was conceived and outlined by Pauline Phelps and Marion Short, and made playable by Mr. Belasco. The plot is remarkable for its simplicity. Now simplicity is an excellent quality in drama, but it is possible for a play to be entirely too simple, to be short on motive and weak in complications. These are the fatal imperfections of the play in which Mr. David Warfield is now appealing to our emotion at the Alcazar. A youth, the protege of a Grand Army Camp, the object of the consuming and tender affection of a foster-father, misappropriates the funds of his benefactors and is committed to the penitentiary by the father of the girl he loves. He is pardoned out within a year, and he is clasped in the arms of the girl as the curtain goes down. That is all there is to the story. Somewhat hackneyed you will say. It is worse than that; it is incomplete and unconvincing. Moreover the drama is anything but plausible. The discovery of the misappropriation of funds is hastened by the judge, the father of the girl, who donates a sum of money to the Grand Army Camp sufficient to pay off its indebtedness providing there is a certain sum in the treasury. If this sum is not in the treasury the donation will be withdrawn. The money that should be in the treasury is the money that has been misappropriated. Apparently the judge had no knowledge of the embezzlement at the time he made his conditional donation. Moreover at the time he was very unfriendly to the Grand Army veterans. And he is a hard-fisted individual who excited the hostility of the veterans by his avariciousness. Perhaps the authors of the play intended that it should be understood that the judge, knowing the funds had been embezzled, offered the money for the purpose of hastening the disclosure of criminality, but if so they failed to render their purpose apprehensible. Nay, from the action of the play it appears that the judge first learns of the embezzlement some hours after he made the donation. Nor is this inconsistency of characterization and implausibility of plot the only defects in the play. While the theme of the drama is the tender and absorbing affection in which the old soldier holds the son of his dead comrade, the authors have failed to concentrate interest in the designs and aspirations of the chief character. The young embezzler commands sympathy and attention, and curiosity respecting his future is excited as the plot develops. He is an inventor intent upon perfecting some mechanical device. You find yourself fervently hoping that he will accomplish something, and it is small gratification to learn that he patented a bolt in the penitentiary. When the curtain goes down you are far from satisfied. The young man has been pardoned out of jail and that is all. You go away wondering whether he'd ever make money enough to support the girl he loves. The old veteran round whom the plot revolves is merely a lay figure at the windup. Cou know that he is happy for the moment, but there has been no great change in his condition. He had to borrow a thousand dollars to make good the amount embezzled. For all you know he still owes the money and is worse off than ever. For all you know the light-fingered youth may plunge him into sorrow again. While the close of a play is very important, it does not seriously concern playwrights who have no conscientious scruples about their art. Kill the villain and pair the virtuous is sufficient formula for them, but from the artistic standpoint a play is absolutely ruined if the close is not only the logical result of preceding action and consistent with the whole, but of such a nature as to satisfy all reasonable curiosity. The close of "A Grand Army Man" was evidently fashioned in deference to exigencies. The time limit having been reached the lovers were rushed together. The relations of all parties are about the same as they were at the beginning. The only knowledge which you have at the end which you did not have at the beginning is that the young hero has paid the penalty of his unsound morals. Here is a play that is little more than a succession of situations, round which has been woven the fascination of a tender affection, and yet it has an abundance of the qualities which please the public. Even a play that is badly constructed and that lacks substantial plot may contain human feeling and truth and life, and "A Grand Army Man" is not lacking in these elements. The difficulty in playwriting is to combine nature and art and this is what Mr. Belasco usually achieves after a fashion. The Belasco mechanism is not always shielded by the art of the dramatist so as to illude us into believing that we are in the presence of spontaneous reality, but despite his occasional bungling he makes us see and feel more intensely what we see and feel in our daily life. His major quality is his gift of lifelike characterization and he always has at least one character in every play that grips and fascinates. In "A Grand Army Man" Wes' Bigelow is the salient character, and as played by Mr. David Warfield it ranks with the most powerful of Belasco's stage portraits. Endued with an elemental passion accentuated by a liberal use of the flowers of fancy and the fruits of observation, in this homely character sadness and gladness alternate like mist and sunshine on an autumn day. And of course this character like all of Belasco's salient characters figures in a coup de theatre. The coup de theatre is inseparable from Belasco's dramaturgy, and it is never a Belasco invention. The wizard always makes use of the semi-unconscious reminiscences that float between his imagination and his memory. In "The Heart of Maryland" he made use of the incident in "Curfew Shall Not Ring Tonight." Into his California mining play he worked the shower of blood scene from "Monte Cristo," and for "A Grand Army Man" he has borrowed the whipping scene from "Uncle Tom's Cabin," and its effect could not be more thrilling were it absolutely novel. The success of the play is of course largely due to the art of David Warfield. This actor has the faculty of imparting to his words more meaning than is inherent in them and of making his audience accept his conception in the face of a text which is beneath it. He converts bathos into pathos, and no matter how obviously theatrical the sentimentalities may be he makes them do their work.

SCENE FROM EDWIN MILTON ROYLE'S DRAMA, "THE SQUAW MAN."

Blanche Arral at the Van Ness, Sunday Afternoon

At the first rehearsal of Mme. Blanche Arral, the Belgian Prima Donna, with Paul Steindorff's grand orchestra, the musicians were so enthralled with the wonderful voice and marvellous technique of the artiste that several of them forgot to play, but simply stopped and listened. No greater compliment could be paid an artist. Mr. Greenbaum thinks that in Blanche Arral, San Francisco will find another case of Adele Verne and Tettrazini. The program is perhaps, the most difficult and brilliant one ever offered in this city. The singer appears six times and five of the numbers are big works with the orchestra. After the Overture to "Martha" by Steindorff's musicians, Mme. Arral will sing the great aria from "Si Jetais Roi" (If I Were King), by Adam. Then comes by way of contrast, the dainty "Voi Che Sapete" from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro"; this will be followed by the complete "Mad Scene" from Thomas' "Hamlet." Mendelssohn's "Scherzo" from "Midsummer Nights Dream" and the "Spinning Wheel of Grandmamma" will be played by the orchestra. With piano accompaniment Mme. Arral will sing "Lo, Hear the Gentle Lark," with flute obligato played by Louis Neubauer, a "Spring Song" by Offenbach and a Russian ballad "Ptitchka" by Evanoff. With orchestral accompaniment Saint-Saen's "Chanson Neapolitaine" from "Le Timbre d'Argent" will be heard for the first time in this city. The program will close with the great "Polacca" from "Mignon." Never before has a singer set herself such a task to perform at one concert. The great musical event will take place Sunday afternoon at half past two o'clock at the Van Ness Theatre.

American dramas yet produced. Mr. Farnum himself has a role that fits him like a glove, whether he wears the red jacket of the British army officer, as he does in the first act, or the buckskin breeches and flannel shirt of the cowboy, as he does in the three other acts. The company is of the best. Mary B. Conwell is the leading woman and a better actress could not be found for the role of countess. Two Indian characters, a peace chief of the Utes and his daughter, whom the hero marries, and whose love and devotion give a new insight to the nature of the daughter of the Western plains, are played in a masterly way by Mitchell Lewis and Katherine Fisher. George Deyo, Logan Paul, Erinsley Shaw, Phillips Smalley, Matt B. Snyder, Charles Nylott, George Wender, Horace Mitchell, Harry Sedley, Cecil Kingstone, William Frederic, Ruth Lloyd, Edith Perchet and Alma Sedley with a score of others complete the cast.

New Season at the Alcazar

With a new leading woman, Miss Evelyn Vaughan, the Alcazar players return to their home theatre next Sunday evening and open the regular season with "The Hypocrites," by Henry Arthur Jones. This play has never been seen here, but is credited with seasons runs in New York and London. "The Hypocrites" tells of an incident in the career of the Reverend Edgar Linnell, curate of Weybury, who says and does what he thinks to be right, regardless of consequences. When he refuses to marry a couple of villagers because he knows that the woman was impure before she met the man and would ruin his life, the aristocratic pseudo moralists condemn his action, but when a young man of their own class betrays a virtuous girl they resolutely object to his proposal that the pair be married. Failing to dissuade the minister from his purpose to have justice done to the girl, they prevail on the distracted victim to ascribe her moral downfall to another, and their unscrupulous plan is in a fair way of succeeding when the young fellow's love is rekindled by her pitiable plight and prompts him to proclaim himself as her betrayer. Among the hypocrites thus confounded are a lord of the manor and his wife, a physician and his wife, a lawyer and a vicar, all of whom consider themselves models of uprightness and are so regarded by their humbler neighbors. Miss Vaughan, the new leading woman, was in San Francisco last year as the principal member of the road company that played "Strongheart," and her acting is pleasantly remembered by all who witnessed that stirring drama. In the cast with her are Bertram Lytell, Will R. Walling, John B. Maher, Howard Hickman, Ernest Glendenning, Burt Wesner, Louise Brownell, Adele Belgarde, Bessie Barriscale, Effie Bond, Anita Murray and the other Alcazar favorites.

EVELYN VAUGHAN.

Success of La Vigne Concert

An auspicious contribution to the musical season was given last Thursday night when Noe J. La Vigne, the dramatic baritone, who sings B flat with perfect ease, gave a concert at Lyric Hall. His numbers ranged from the prologue to Pagliacci and "La Donna e Mobile" from Rigoletto to "Silver Threads Among the Gold." The fourteen songs were all applauded to the echo, particularly "The Coming of the King," by Joseph Roeckel. Schubert's "Erl King" also received splendid treatment. Miss Betty Scholtz, a telented young violinist and graduate of the Berlin Conservatory of Music, played compositions of Vieuxtemps, De Beriot and Wieniawski, in a way that won the large and critical audience and Miss Alma Rudolph and Mr. F. B. Kirwan made very satisfactory accompanists.

Success of the Maclean-Etlin Recital

The Maclean-Etlin recital, last Saturday evening, proved a notable event. Mr. Maclean's singing is remarkable for a perfect mastery and control, showing the sureness and perfection of his method. His wonderful pianissimo effects are only attained after years of study. For example, "L'Heure Exquise" by Hahn was sung entirely under the breath and yet every note penetrated to the farthest corner of the hall. In contrast to this the "Malediction d'Alexandrie" from Thais was fairly vibrant with dramatic force. Of the two Wolf songs, "Biterolf" was perhaps the best, while the English songs "I'm Wearin' awa'" and "Melisande in the Wood" seemed to please the audience. The first was sung with a simplicity and tenderness that brought his hearers very near to tears. Altogether Mr. MacLean's rendering of his fine program was most sincere and artistic. Mr. Etlin, who is a French pianist of note, showed himself possessed of a wonderful virtuosity and it would be difficult to choose the best number of his program. His playing of the Chopin Sonata reminded much of Josef Hoffmann, especially the "Funeral March." Perhaps the most exquisite was "Le Coucon of Daquin," which showed the wonderful clearness of the French school. The "Tarantelle" of Moskowsky was played with wonderful force and spirit and the "Mephisto Waltz" revealed a remarkable technique.

At the Princess

There remain but two more weeks of Ferris Hartman at the Princess. For next week the program will consist of "The Ameer," a musical comedy, which Frank Daniels first made popular. Ferris Hartman will appear as Iffe Kahn, Ameer of Afghanistan, which will be remembered as one of his most popular Tivoli performances. Joseph Fogarty will make his first appearance at this theatre and play Heezaburd, the Lord Chamberlain, and Walter de Leon will have a congenial role as Crackasmile, the Court Jester. Arthur Cunningham is splendidly provided for as Ralph Winston, captain of the British Guards. Sybil Page will be Constance, an American heiress and Zoe Barnett will be a confidential pal, Fanny. Sarah Edwards will represent oriental beauty as Mirza and the other characters will be appropriately cast. Kolb and Dill, the favorite Dutch comedians, supported by a big eastern company, will begin an engagement at this theatre October 26th.

"The Sign of the Cross" at the Valencia

Starting next Sunday afternoon, the Valencia Theatre will present an elaborate revival of Wilson Barrett's great play, "The Sign of the Cross." This drama will most appropriately follow the current offering of "The Devil," and the transition from hell to the more sacred precincts will be accomplished easily by the stock company. Robert Warwick will cast aside the cynical mask of the devil, to assume the toga of virtue as exemplified by Marcus Superbus, prefect of Rome. The barbaric settings of ancient Rome will be reproduced in all their splendor under the capable stage direction of Sedley Brown, and the full strength of the stock company will be utilized. Miss Willette Kershaw will have the best part she has yet essayed when she appears as Mercia, the Christian maiden. Miss Peggy Henree has been selected to play Stephanes, the boy, and the other roles will be in safe hands. "The Sign of the Cross" is an ambitious undertaking, for it is a tremendous scenic production, and requires the services of a small army of supernumeraries. The costuming will be unusually rich and elaborate. Incidental to the second act, showing the court of Nero, there will be a dance by Miss Evelyn Feshia. "The Sign of the Cross" will positively be seen only one week, with the usual matinees Saturday, Wednesday and Sunday.

The Lloyd Scott Travel Talks

Lloyd Scott has certainly proved himself a splendid raconteur and the people present at his opening "Travel-Talk" at Christian Science Hall, Monday night, expressed themselves as delighted with both the speaker and his pictures. The views are most interesting and beautiful the coloring being delicate and artistic, quite different from the usual stereoptican views. The panoramic and motion pictures were exceptionally fine and one scarcely realized at the close that one had been an hour and a half in the hall. These "Travel-Talks" are unique entertainments and most fascinating. This was demonstrated by the large number of people who surrounded the box office at the close securing seats for further events. Friday night of this week and the Saturday special matinee will be devoted to "Japan;" Saturday night Russia will be the subject. Next week "Russia," Monday night; "Egypt," Tuesday and Thursday nights, and "Ireland" Friday and Saturday nights. The second matinee will be devoted to "Egypt." School children, half rates at the matinees.

The Orpheum Bill

The Orpheum offers for next week a bill that will excel in magnitude, variety, novelty and worth any that has been given at the popular theatre in many a moon. Gennare's Venetian Gondolier Band, which created a furore in New York and other cities of the east will be the principal feature. Signor Gennare is a musician of ability whose leadership is characterized by a variety of extraordinary gesticulation which call to mind Creatore, whom he totally eclipses in the way of eccentricity. Miss Carter, a soprano of note, comes with the band. Madame Theresa Renz, the most famous equestrienne in the world, will exhibit her splendid trained horses, who are all prize winners. She executes a serpentine dance on horseback. Gracie Emmett, who will make her first vaudeville appearance here, was last seen in the dramatic success, "A Barrel of Money," several years ago. She will present an amusing farce, entitled "Mrs. Murphy's Second Husband," which is described as one continuous round of laughter. The Jupiter Brothers, marvelous illusionists, who make their appearance in the guise of cowboys, will be an interesting and puzzling feature of the performance. Next week will be the last of "General" Edward LaVine, the Saytons, Belle Hathaway's Monkeys and of that delightful quartette, the Cadets de Gascogne. A new series of motion pictures will be the finale to the entertainment

Oakland to Have the Greenbaum Attractions

Manager Greenbaum will present all of his attractions in Oakland this season as the support accorded his offerings in our sister city warrant his placing Oakland on the high class musical and artistic circuit established between here and Chicago. His first offering will be a complete course of the Lloyd Scott "Travel-Talks" to be given at "Maple Hall" commencing Monday night, October 19th with "India." "Japan" will be given Wednesday night and "Russia" Friday night. The course will be completed the following week with "Egypt" on Monday night and "Ireland" Wednesday night.

This will be the first time that "Travel-Talks" have been offered in any city in the State outside of San Francisco and Los Angeles as former speakers never had the time to devote to a tour of the Coast. In November Signor Emilio De Gogorza will sing at "Ye Liberty Playhouse." Adele Verne will give a piano recital at the same place and Beatrice Fine will appear at Ebell Hall. In December Nordica and her company and Hartmann the violinist will be the attractions.

Pasmore Concert at Greek Theatre

The third of the four popular orchestral concerts in the Greek Theatre, on October 10th, will be a concerto concert by the Misses Pasmore and an orchestra of thirty-five directed by Mr. H. B. Pasmore. The program will be as follows: "Gloria California," Pasmore, Orchestra; Concerto in A minor, Opus 33, Saint Saens, Miss Dorothy Pasmore, 'Cellist, and Orchestra; Concerto in A minor, Opus 54, Schumann, Miss Suzanne Pasmore, Pianist, and Orchestra; Spanish Symphony, "Lalo," Miss Mary Pasmore, Violinist, and Orchestra.

In the Limelight

Thursday evening, October 22, is the date set for the joint concert of Beatrice Priest Fine and Anna Miller Wood. Manager Greenbaum promises an unusual program with no less than eleven works to be heard for the first time in this city.

The latest contract signed by Manager Greenbaum is with Mischa Elman, the violinist. Schumann-Heink will come here in February, 1910, as she remains in Europe for one year.

A young American pianist, Alfred Calzin, from Detroit, has created a sensational success in Berlin. He will tour this country in conjunction with Arthur Hartmann, the Hungarian violinist. They will appear here early in December.

Virginia Foltz is soon to play the leading role in the Boston "Merry Widow" company.

Mrs. Fiske will open her New York season this month at the Belasco theatre. Her new play is by Brewster Sheldon, and has not yet been named.

Henry Dixie is going on the road in one of "The Devil" companies, now being organized by Henry Savage.

Auto Notes

E. P. Brinegar of the Pioneer Automobile Company, received word yesterday from the Harry S. Houpt Auto Agency in New York that the entering by them of a six 40 Thomas car in the recent twenty-four race at Brighton Beach was done merely as an experiment to try the durability and strength of the new car, this being the first event in which the 6-40 had competed. The fact that the car did not lose a minute's time on account of motor trouble, and was only out of the race long enough to take on gasoline and water and to make one change of tires, speaks well for the perfect mechanism and Diamond tires on the new machine.

Mr. E. W. Hopkins, with Miss Florence Hopkins, Mr. and Mrs. Warren Clarke and Frank Anderson, in their '09 Packard touring car, drove from Detroit to the White Mountains and are now at the St. Regis in New York City. Mr. Hopkins reports a delightful trip and good weather.

Mr. C. E. Mathewson, Pacific Coast manager of the Diamond Rubber Company, has just returned from a trip to the factories at Akron, Ohio, and reports unusual success with the new red automobile tube The red tube, it has been found, will not deteriorate anywhere near as quickly as the gray tube. In fact, the factory has several of the red tubes which they have been holding for test purposes for over a year and have carried around in automobiles unwrapped and left lying in the bright sunlight. In spite of all this the tubes are still as fresh and pliable as when first turned out.

Another strenuous trip in his Chalmers-Detroit 40 h. p. touring car has just been completed by J. H. Thede, the prominent motorist of Madera. This car in the last six months has traveled more than five thousand miles, and has never been laid up for repairs.

W. B. Lloyd of Petaluma was here Sunday on his faw home after an extended tour of Central California. He drove from Petaluma to Woodland, to Sacramento and then down the San Joaquin Valley to Modesto. In making the return trip in his two-cylinder Buick touring car he covered the road from Modesto to Oakland in five and one-half hours.

The record of fourteen hours and one minutes from Pittsburg to Philadelphia, made less than a month ago, has been shattered. The car to accomplish this feat was the Thomas Light Six, which was driven by George Salzman, with George T. Verreault and H. A. Carroll of the Pittsburg Dispatch, as official observer, and Elmer Huber, as mechanic, making the run in thirteen hours and fifty-two minutes from city to city. The distance of 309 1-2 miles was made in nine minutes less time than the car making the previous record, which covered a distance of but 302 miles.

Interest along automobile row was centered Saturday in the latest model of the 1909 six-cylinder 40 h. p. Thomas car, the demonstrating machine of which arrived at the Pioneer Automobile Company. Finished in dark blue with yellow running gear, the car presents an unusually graceful appearance, following as it does the latest lines of the highest grade foreign cars.

A Chalmers-Detroit "30" car, which is making a run of 200 miles a day for one hundred days, has completed the first two weeks of its strenuous tests. Four trips a day is the regular program for the "Pontiac car," as it is called by the people of Detroit. The car starts each morning at 5 o'clock from the Pontchartrain Hotel, running out to Pontiac, 26 miles, and returning in time for breakfast. Even for this early trip there are generally three or four passengers. The second trip is made at 8:30 o'clock. Two afternoon trips are made, the first at 12 o'clock and the last trip at 4 p. m. The success of the "double daily century run" is exciting much interest in Detroit, and bets are being made as to whether the car will keep it up. So far not the slightest trouble has developed, and the Chalmers people are confident that the "30" will successfully complete its 20,000 miles.

E. B. Watson, who has acquired quite a reputation as a speed-burner in his Buick "White Streak," enjoyed a ride over the Fillmore street hill one day last week. He was accompanied in the somewhat thrilling journey by M. Mohrange. The trip was undertaken by Mr. Watson to satisfy himself as to the hill climbing abilities of his car.

Dr. E. F. Donnelly of this city has taken delivery from the Howard Automobile Company of a Buick "White Streak." The car which the doctor purchased is equipped with double rumble seats.

One hundred and twenty-five miles on six gallons of gasoline is what W. Huffner claims to be a record for consumption of gas on a long distance tour. Huffner, who drives a Chalmers-Detroit touring car, says he drove from this city to San Jose, then to Alviso, back to the Garden City and home, via the Haywards and Oakland route, on six gallons of gasoline.

D. O. Church of the Warren Improvement Company, returned this week from an extended combined business and pleasure trip to Reno, Nevada, in his 30 h. p. Buick touring car. He was called to Nevada on business connected with several large contracts which his company is at work on, and took the opportunity to enjoying a short vacation at the many resorts about Lake Tahoe and in the high Sierras.

snake. It was an ugly dragon. It was Amako, Tokiwa's cruel and jealous husband. His face was wet with his exertions. His crafty, half-blind eyes gleamed with bitter hatred, and the moonlight revealed a horrible leer upon his face. He, too, saw the drawing in the sand, the course, fat god laughing, laughing at the love-words of Tokiwa! But Amako did not laugh. He cursed in his heart. Nearer and nearer he crept till he knelt exactly behind his wife, bending a little so that he might not cast a shadow. So intent was Tokiwa upon watching the sleeping priest, interpreting every smile she saw, even pressing her hand upon his chest, that she was unaware of any other presence.

Amako waited for some time, then, with a shout of anger, he rolled Tokiwa over in the sand. "Faithless and wretched wife," hissed Amako between his teeth, "forsaking me at night, creeping into a temple garden, and loving a priest!"

Sanzo awoke from his heavy slumber, and laid a restraining hand upon the angry Amako as he listened to the explanation of this strange scene.

"Do you know this woman?" shouted Amako.

"Very well!" replied the priest.

"And this writing in the sand, it that yours, Tokiwa?"

"Yes," replied the woman.

"Very well, then," continued Amako, "pay your respects or your love to this priest, and join me later." Then Amako, in a terrible rage, took his departure; but before he had gone many paces Sanzo was at his side.

"What are you going to do with her?" inquired the priest.

"Is she out of hearing? Yes. When she is asleep I shall kill her!"

Sanzo groaned in the agony of his dispair as he read the writing in the sand. "What if I tell her and she does not come back again?" The veins in Amako's forehead stood out in great blue knots. "If you tell her," said he, "I shall kill you!" And Amako put his hand in his robe.

"You need not draw out your dirk. Your wife has sinned. You shall kill to-night!"

Amako went away to his home, sharpened his dirk, and then lay down upon the futon and waited.

III.

When Sanzo returned to Tokiwa, he found her weeping bitterly. "There, little one, do not weep any more." "Oh, but I am wicked, very wicked. I have wronged you, you who are a holy priest and do not love me any more!"

Tokiwa looked up into his face. "But you smiled in your sleep. Were you dreaming?"

"Yes," replied Sanzo, "but I cannot tell you what I dreamt. The ghosts of old days come back again in our dreams sometimes."

"I don't mind what happens to me now that I have knelt and watched my dear one sleeping."

"Hush! You must not speak like that. If you love me you must do just what I tell you."

"Yes, yes," answered the woman, "it is my joy always to obey you."

Sanzo slipped off his black robe, and said: "Go behind that fir tree, little one, take off your kimona, and put on this one. Then, with this knife, cut off your hair and bring it to me."

And presently Tokiwa returned with her kimona in one hand and her beautiful black tresses in the other.

"Now," said Sanzo, "I am going to put on your kimona. Ah, how funny I shall look!" Sanzo put on the silk kimona, and tied the obi round his waist. With a fine cord he piled up the black tresses upon his head, and after much contrivance it made a fair representation of a Japanese coiffure. This done, he took out his writing materials from a hollow in a tree and hurriedly wrote a letter. "When I am gone, Tokiwa, go to the temple with this letter, and they will take you in. Wait there for a little while, and all shall be well."

"Yes, yes, but all can never be well now, never, never!" And Tokiwa began to weep. Sanzo looked at her in his black robe. "I am going away now. I shall write something in the sand; but do not read it until I have gone. Good-bye, little one!"

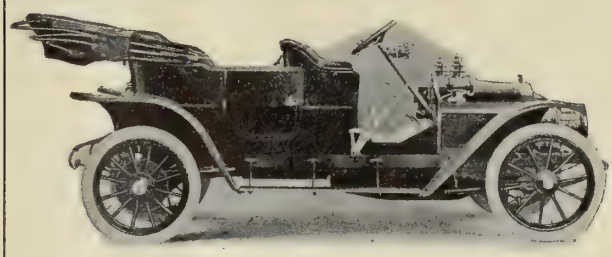
Tokiwa, with tears in her eyes, wound her arms tightly round Sanzo's knees, and then suddenly let him go. There was a look in Sanzo's eyes that told her all she wanted to know, all that was worth knowing.

IV.

Straight to the house of Amako went Sanzo, shuffling along with small steps just as he knew Tokiwa would walk. There was a great joy in his heart as he thought of the black-robed figure sitting in the temple garden. "My priests will be kind to her, and the little children will love her when she sings to them," said he.

Sanzo tapped upon the shutter of Amako's house. A moment later he found himself in a room almost in total darkness.

"Don't speak to me! Lie down and go to sleep!" exclaimed Amako. Sanzo obeyed.



Sanzo feigned slumber when he deemed it wise to do so. He knew what was in store for him. There would be a sharp, tearing pain, and then an end. But in the temple garden sat Tokiwa, and his death meant her life. When was the blow coming? It seemed such a long time coming.

Amako turned over on his left side. Sanzo heard the sound of an arm drawn slowly over the quilt. And then the end came. At the rising of the sun Sanzo's brave soul sped on its way to a new and fuller life. At that very moment Tokiwa rose and read the writing of Sanzo in the sand, and the words were: "Such a little thing it is to die for you!"

V.

Amako completely covered over the dead body by his side. There was no pity in his heart at the sight of that silent form beneath its wrapping. Once he made as though to look at the face. Then he drew away with a shudder. He went outside his dwelling and looked down the road. Seeing two fishermen, he called them to him. "Very miserable and lonesome is my heart to-day, fishermen. My wife, Tokiwa, died in the night, and I have a fancy to sail with her out to sea and bury her beneath the blue waves. Will you help me carry her down? Will you lend me your boat?"

The fishermen eyed Amako suspiciously. They liked not these unusual proceedings; but money to them was more than a Buddhist funeral, and after much bargaining they consented to carry the dead body down to the sea.

The fishermen pulled down their boat, set up the white fluted sail, and pushed the prow of the craft into the water.

Amako took his seat in the stern and helped the fishermen lay the body gently down in the boat. "Bring me some of those big stones over there," said Amako.

The fishermen obeyed.

Amako took a morbid pleasure in his solitary journey with the dead as the fishermen stood on the shore counting their money.

In the meantime Tokiwa entered the temple of her lord. She gave the letter Sanzo had written to a kind-looking priest named Kuroda. When he had read it, he called his brethren together. "Sanzo, our dear brother, is dead!" said he. "But it was an honorable death. We will perform all the ceremonies befitting a great and good man in due time. This matter must be investigated at once. Come with me to the house of Amako to claim Sanzo's body and bring his wicked murderer to justice. You, Tokiwa, must remain here until our return."

The priests set forth upon their journey. Now another vessel skimmed over the water, sail and oars uniting to quicken the speed. When the boats were alongside, Amako was tying stones to the dead body with a horrible smile of pleasure upon his face.

"What are you doing?" said Kuroda fiercely.

"Alas! honorable priest, I am burying my wife who died last night. Wherefore do you come to look upon the burial of Tokiwa?"

"It is not Tokiwa! It is the body of Sanzo whom you killed last night!"

"It is Tokiwa!" shouted Amako hoarsely.

"Pull back the wrapping and look upon the face," replied Kuroda.

Amako pulled aside the wrapping, and Sanzo, the priest, smiled back at him.

Personal Abuse in Political Campaigns

Blaine it is hard to say. Even if he should fail to be re-elected to the Senate nobody will be able to say for a certainty that his failure was due to the Hearst charges, for the fact is that he had a desperate fight on his hands even before the Archbold letters were produced. And even though he should suffer defeat it would be absurd to conclude that his political career had come to an end. Men of his prodigious ability cannot be killed off so easily. He can handle himself as dramatically as Blaine or Conkling, and there are few men of that kind left in politics these days. For him there is very likely to be propitious reaction, especially when the people of Ohio begin to recall his past services and the ingratitude of the men he befriended. It was Foraker who first thrust Taft into public prominence. The latter had been an assistant prosecuting attorney and a collector of internal revenue. Foraker made him a judge of the Superior Court of Cincinnati. Taft was then but twenty-nine, and he had been engaged in a forensic duel with Foraker, trying, as representative of the Bar Association to secure the disbarment of a Cincinnati lawyer of the name of T. C. Campbell. The lawyer's attorney was J. B. Foraker, and he saved his client. Being elected Governor not long afterward, Foraker appointed his young opponent to a place on the bench where, twenty-two years before, Taft's father had sat before he became (as his son has also become) the nation's Secretary of War. It was Foraker also who first took up the fight against Hanna and Hanna's machine to give Theodore Roosevelt the Presidential nomination after he had filled out President McKinley's unexpired term. The whirligig of politics produces strange results. Against these two men Senator Foraker is now making the fight of his life; for his relations with both of them have disappointed the Senator. He expected, after the election of Roosevelt, to be a court favorite and to supersede Hanna as a dispenser of patronage in Ohio. President Roosevelt did not view things in the same light. And when, two years ago, the Secretary of War made a speech in the Ohio campaign that pulled down from his high horse Foraker's first lieutenant in Cincinnati, George B. Cox, the milk of human kindness in the Senator's bosom changed to gall, and it was not long after that he took to the warpath with all the Federal captains lined up against him.

While at this distance from the seat of war it is assumed that Foraker is down and out, by reading the eastern press editorials and letters from the people one may easily see that there is room for doubt. In some quarters it is believed that the effect of Hearst's attack has been minimized by the undignified and brutal conduct of the President. Some papers believe that Roosevelt has done more harm to Taft than to Foraker. Even the Republican press has taken to warning Roosevelt and the New York Sun in a fit of disgust exclaimed: "Let self respecting Americans of all political faiths unite in the fervent prayer that the unexampled frenzy or spasm of self-exhibition which is now degrading the office of President of the United States may end before the scandal invites the attention and excites the disgust of the whole civilized world. And it is not just that Taft should suffer."

And Mr. Hearst who started all the row is being reprobated for making use of stolen letters. He has openly been charged with having been subsidized by the Republican campaign managers to conduct a guerrilla warfare for the destruction of the Democratic party. Copies of telegrams sent by Mr. De Ford, one of Hearst's attorneys, to William Ullman, the representative of Charles P. Taft, have been produced and published, the purpose being to show that Hearst's disclosures were prearranged in the interest of the Republican candidate. These telegrams are not convincing.

Success of the Chamberlain Sisters

While the death of Miss Esther Chamberlain was not entirely unexpected, it comes none the less as a shock to both personal and literary friends. She had been ill almost since the appearance of the last novel by "the Chamberlain Sisters," and now, following the announcement of the publishers that the story has been successfully prepared for stage presentation, comes the sad news that one of its authors will never know the full story of her success. It was Miss Lucia Chamberlain who first took up writing, and made a name for herself while Miss Esther engaged in the then novel occupation of supplying illustrations for advertising matter, but in 1903 the two girls, who were always inseparable from their cradle days, began to collaborate. The first fruit of their joint pens was "The Blue Moon," which appeared in Ainslie's and gave proof at once that they had no intention of following commonplace models, but were ready to strike out from the shore and swim with their own stroke. The next product of the collaboration was "Mrs. Essington," a type of the better grade of "summer novel," the scene of which was laid in San Francisco and south to Del Monte. In speaking of the story the sisters disarmed criticism by stating at once that they had no intention of picturing types or reproducing "local color." The plot simply required an atmosphere which was vital and young, and knowing both the east and the west, out of their experience they chose the California setting because it was most suitable. Similarly, though the local world has been trying most assiduously to identify the characters in "The Coast of Chance" the authors of the novel frankly stated that "it never happened; its characters never existed outside its pages." The Chamberlains are closely related to the local artistic colony, and it was hoped that Miss Esther would be led to still further collaborate by giving her attention to the illustration of future novels. Had she supplied the pictures for "The Coast of Chance," the hero, after gathering blue irises, would not have been caught presnting scarlet carnations to its heroine.

Honors for Dr. Weir Mitchell

Dr. S. Weir Mitchell of Philadelphia, was recently elected "foreign fellow" of the Royal Society of England, the oldest and most distinguished scientific body in the English-speaking world. There are but three other Americans carried on its roll. Alexander Agassiz, George W. Hill, the astronomer, and Simon Newcomb, the mathematician. Benjamin Franklin was the first American honored by an election to membership. Dr. Mitchell, though well past his seventy-fifth year, in addtion to being one of the greatest nerve specialists in the medical profession, and the originator of the rest cure, is a poet of distinction and well up in the front rank of American novelists. His "Hugh Wynne, Free Quaker," which preceded the flood-tide of colonial and Revolutionary fiction, and so escaped the ignominy heaped on the "historical" heap, is one of the best books dealing with that period, and his "Red City," now current in the Century, takes up the thread of the same story at the end of the war and in the days of Washington's administration. Dr. Mitchel has contributed valuable additions to scientific and medical literature likewise. He was one of the first to make a study of the poison of serpents, and he has investigated the singular nervous effects which are wrought on individual temperaments by certain animals, perfumes, etc.

Scotch and Irish Toasts

Perhaps it was flying in the face of Providence for the H. M. Caldwell Company to have chosen this year of the triumph of the Prohibition cause, to issue their "Irish Toasts, by Shan Na Gael" and "Scottish Toasts by Ivor Ben McIvor," but it's a poor heart that never rejoices and a poor spirit that cannot appreciate a kindly thought. Not all the toasts are of the convivial order. In both collections there are sentiments of patriotism, of humor, of friendship and of the social virtues. The sons of the "land o' cakes" will find done up in the bright tartan of the Royal Stuarts familiar quotations from Burns, Allan Ramsey, James Ferguson and a score or more of good stories. Equally appropriate is the dress for the companion booklet. Shamrock green, with enough of the four-leaved variety to secure good luck. Print and page decorations are of the beloved color, while Tom Moore, and other immortal bards contribute their quota to its contents. One finds extracts from "Garryowen na Gloria," which President Roosevelt says is the finest fighting tune in the world; from Lever and Lover and all the Irish world besides. The Gaelic League has not been forgotten and the old tongue figures here and there. A book of toasts is not an anthology, and in the nature of things there must be more omitted than included, yet one rather wishes that "Shan Na Gael" had given us also at least a part of that exquisite little gem by Moira O'Neil,

"Over here in England I'm helpin' with the hay,
An' I wish I was in Ireland the livelong day.
Weary on the English hay, and sorra' take the wheat,
Och! Corymeela an' the blue sky over it!"

If the author ever runs across a story by Charles Reade, "Born to Good Luck," he will find in the closing paragraph a characteristic Irish toast, "May he live till the skirts of his coat knock his brains out, and him dancing an Irish fling to 'The Wind that Shakes the Barley.'" These are the first of the holiday productions, and in matter and manner they are an augury of good things to come.

Vagaries of Mrs. Humphrey Ward

The "vagaries of genius" would be called plain bad manners and ill-breeding in common folks. Here is a story told of Mrs. Humphrey Ward some years ago, while she was sojourning in Italy. It happened that there was a house party being entertained at a short distance from the villa which she was occupying, and among the guests was an Italian statesman whom the novelist desired to meet in order to discuss certain political questions with him, so she sent an invitation to the hostess to appear at luncheon with her guests. They accepted with alacrity, and when they appeared a maid welcomed them and asked them to begin the repast, saying that Mrs. Ward would join them later. When the meal was nearly finished she came in, her gown and hair rumpled and her manner much abstracted. She placed a chair beside that of the statesman and entered into an animated conversation with him in French, paying no attention whatever to anyone else. When she had gathered the information she wanted she went back upstairs, saying that she hoped they would stay as long as they pleased and ask the maid for anything they wanted, "and that was the last we saw of her," says the narrator. It is said that not even her favorite daughter would dare enter a room where she is at work.

Cable's Latest Work

George W. Cable is correcting the final proofs of a new novel to be issued shortly by the Scribners. It will concern itself with the Civil War and the scene is to be chiefly laid in New Orleans and its vicinity. Mr. Cable was a Confederate soldier himself, and there is a current rumor that he became persona non grata in the South because a series of articles contributed to the Century Magazine were interpreted as being inimicably critical to his own section. If there is any foundation of truth in the story then the South must be sensitive to the point of touchiness. There was some absurd and belated abolition sentiment aroused over the same articles, particularly one in which the author reminiscing on things and times that were, quoted a strain of one of the popular war songs, "And yet, and yet, we cannot forget," adding for himself, "and we would not." Why any rational being should expect the South to blot out four years of its history and heroisms passes understanding. Forget the bitterness and outlive the sharp edge of grief they may and must, but more than that is beyond human power or reason.

In Sir Grant Duff's diary he records that Sir Walter Scott once read three chapters of "Waverley" to the brother of a peer, long before it was published, but the titled critic was not impressed. "Na, na, Wattie," said he; "that won't do; stick to your poetry."

MICHAEL FARRARA,
Plaintiff,
vs.
LUCIE FARRARA,
Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA, send greeting to LUCIE FARRARA, Defendant.

YOU ARE HEREBY REQUIRED to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, on the ground of defendant's extreme cruelty, also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

GIVEN under my hand and the Seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 29th day of July, A. D. 1908.

CATHERINE STAPLETON,
Plaintiff,
vs.
ALL PERSONS CLAIMING ANY INTEREST IN OR LIEN UPON, THE REAL PROPERTY HEREIN DESCRIBED, OR ANY PART THEREOF.
Defendants.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA to all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described, or any part thereof, Defendants, Greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Catherine Stapleton, plaintiff, filed with the Clerk of the above-entitled Court and County, within three (3) months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property, or any part thereof, situate, lying and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and particularly described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the westerly line of Franklin street, at its intersection with the northerly line of Ivy avenue, and running thence northerly along said westerly line of Franklin street twenty-five (25) feet, thence at right angles westerly and parallel with the north line of Ivy avenue one hundred and seven (107) feet six (6) inches, thence at right angles southerly twenty-five (25) feet to the northerly line of Ivy avenue, thence at right angles easterly and along said northerly line of Ivy avenue one hundred and seven (107) feet six (6) inches to the westerly line of Franklin street, and the point of commencement, being a portion of Western Addition, Block No. 139.

And you are hereby notified that unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit:

That it be adjudged that the plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple absolute; that her title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiff recover her costs herein and have such other and further relief as may be meet in the premises.

WITNESS my hand and the seal of said Court, this 31st day of August, A. D. 1908.
